Buonaparte, aware of the precarious tenure by which France held her colonies in the west, determined, if possible, to secure her dominions in the east, and with this view, an armament was fitted out at Brest, consisting of a strong naval force, under the command of Admiral Linois, on board of which were placed 6000 troops. This expedition sailed soon after the breaking out of the war, with orders to touch at the Cape of Good Hope, and to place that colony in such a state of defence as to be enabled to resist any attack that might be made upon it by the English.

In Europe also, the French armies were immediately put in motion, and the Consular government, anxious to justify their conduct to the French nation, and to Europe, published a declaration, dated the 20th of May, on the causes, which led to the recal of their ambassador from London, and the renewal of the war with Great Britain.

During the long protracted negociation, a considerable French army had been assembled in Holland, and on the frontiers of Hanover; and no sooner had his Majesty's declaration of war been laid before the British Parliament, than the French General Mortier, advancing from his head-quarters at Coeverden, summoned the Hanoverian electorate to surrender to the republican army. In the attack on Hanover, Buonaparte formally professed that he should occupy that country merely as a pledge for the restoration of Malta, and endeavoured to cover this flagrant violation of the constitution and independence of the Germanic empire, by asserting, that it was merely for the purpose of compelling the King of England to maintain the peace of Amiens, that he ordered his army to occupy that portion of Germany, in which the present reigning family of England were peculiarly interested. Although it was impossible that the electorate could oppose any effectual stand against the immense power of France, the Duke of Cambridge was sent over from England, as Commander-in-Chief in that country, and proclamations were published in the name of His Royal Highness, and on the authority of the Hanoverian government, calling upon all the inhabitants capable of bearing arms, to rally round the standard of their country. On the 26th of May, however, the invading army entered the town of Bentheim, where the Hanoverian garrison, consisting of an officer and 36 men, surrendered themselves prisoners of war. Two days after this, the French force passed the river Ems, at Mippen, and the following day, a body of 10,000 French troops entered the principality of Osnaburgh, which had been previously evacuated by the Hanoverians. General Walmoden, to whom the command of the Hanoverian troops was intrusted, having collected an army of 18,000 regulars, now determined to make a stand in his position, on the Hunte; expecting, in the mean time, to receive considerable assistance from General Hammerstein, who occupied the town of Diepholtz, with a formidable force of infantry, cavalry, and artillery. After the necessary preparations, a division of French infantry, under the command of General Schiner, and another of cavalry, led by General Nansouty, advancing to the Hunte, forced the passage of that river, and directed their march to Sublingen, with a view to cutting off whatever force might be stationed between that town and Diepholtz. This manœuvre so far succeeded as to oblige General Hammerstein to retreat during the night, and to take up his station at Borstoen. On the 1st of June, a smart skirmish took place between the Hanoverian rear-guard, and the French advanced picquets, which was succeeded, on the 2d, by a severe cannonade, on the part of the electoral troops; but General Drouet, advancing with a charge of cavalry, obliged them to retire. The Weser was now the last line of defence for the Hanoverian army, and the banks of that river were strongly planted with artillery; but, at the moment when General Mortier had advanced into the vicinity of the town of Nienborg, the head-quarters of the Hanoverians, a deputation arrived from the civil and military authorities of Hanover, intreating him to suspend his march. With this request, he consented to comply, on condition that the invaders should be put in possession of all the fortresses in the electorate, together with the arms, artillery, and ammunition, of the enemy. It was further stipulated by this convention, which was signed at Sublingen, that the Hanoverian army should retire behind the Elbe, and engage not to serve against France, or her allies, during the war, or until regularly exchanged. On the 5th of June, the French advanced without further molestation, and took possession of the city of Hanover, where they found a prodigious quantity of artillery and ammunition. Besides the absolute value of the electorate as a conquest, which enabled the enemy to remount their cavalry, and recruit their drooping finances, they were now masters of the navigation of the Elbe and the Weser, and as had been foreseen, they hastened to improve this circumstance to their own advantage, and to the annoyance of their adversary. Being now in the immediate neighbourhood of the commercial Hanse Towns of Hamburgh and Bremen, the French Generals were enabled to levy considerable sums of money on those opulent cities, under the shape of loans; and while the continental powers patiently submitted to this outrageous violation of the German empire, no prospect presented itself of limiting their future exactions.* His Britannic Majesty, however, as Elector of Hanover, refused to ratify the convention of Sublingen, on which General Mortier addressed a letter to Marshal Count Walmoden, the Hanoverian General, apprising him of this refusal, and of his consequent determination to re-commence the campaign, unless the marshal would consent to surrender his army, and allow them to be marched into France as prisoners of war. Count Walmoden replied, that his army preferred perishing with arms in their hands, rather than to submit to this humiliating proposal; that they had already made sufficient sacrifices for their country, and that they must now defend their own honour: the officer, by whom this spirited answer was conveyed, was, however, empowered to state, that if any acceptable terms were offered, they would probably not be rejected. A negociation ensued, which terminated in a convention, signed on the 5th of July, by which it was stipulated, that the Hanoverian army should be totally disbanded, and return to their homes, upon their parole not to serve against France, or her allies, until regularly exchanged; and its artillery and military stores were all to be given up to the enemy. Exclusively of the grand fleet at Brest, which, it was presumed, was destined for the invasion of Ireland, an immense number of transports were ordered to be built and collected, with the greatest expedition, in the French ports. The idea that some thousands of gun-boats might force their way across the Channel, in spite of the British navy, was universally received in France; and, in the course of the year, so astonishing were the exertions of the republicans, in this department of their naval preparations, that a sufficient flotilla was assembled at Boulogne, to carry over any army that France might see proper to employ in this desperate enterprise.

It ought to be remarked, that, in this contest, Great Britain fairly accepted the challenge thrown, when the French government vain-gloriously asserted, "with conscious pride, that England alone could not maintain a struggle against France." Buonaparte soon found it necessary to call in the aid of auxiliary states, and to force the weaker powers, by which she was surrounded, to engage in her quarrel. Holland, contrary to her wishes, and in evident violation of her interests, and the Italian republic, were compelled to become parties with France. Spain and Portugal were also compelled to furnish pecuniary assistance to France in so open and extensive a manner, that it rested entirely with the policy or magnanimity of Great Britain, whether those kingdoms should not be considered as involved in direct acts of hostility.

Independently of these measures, a step was taken at the commencement of the contest, which had never before been resorted to among civilised nations, and which must always be regarded as an act of abominable barbarity and injustice. It appeared from an article published in the Moniteur, the official organ of the French government, "that two English frigates had captured two merchant vessels in the bay of Audierne, without any previous declaration of war, and in manifest violation of the law of nations." In consequence of which a decree, signed by the First Consul, was issued, directing, "that all the English, from the age of 18 to 60, or persons holding any commissions from his Britannic Majesty, who are at present in France, shall immediately be considered prisoners of war, to answer for those citizens of the republic who may have been arrested, and made prisoners, by the vessels or subjects of his Britannic Majesty, previously to any declaration of war." In virtue of this decree, all the nobility, commercial travellers, and others, subjects of his majesty the king of England, who had incautiously put themselves within the reach of Buonaparte in France, and who were engaged in travelling through any of those countries occupied by the French armies, were either shut up in prisons, or confined to particular places, as prisoners of war upon their parole, and not allowed to exceed the limits prescribed to them. This flagitious violation of the law of nations, and of neutral hospitality, was further aggravated by a perfidious promise previously made to the English subjects, that they should enjoy the protection of the government after the departure of the British ambassador, as extensively as during his residence at Paris.

The naval campaign of the present year, in Europe, was not particularly distinguished. On the 14th of September, however, the port and town of Granville were successively attacked by Sir James Saumarez; on which occasion the pier was demolished, and a number of vessels, intended for the invasion of England, destroyed. On the same day, the town and fort of Dieppe were bombarded by Captain Owen, in the Immortalité frigate, with the Theseus and Sulphur bombs, under his command. The Dutch ports, from the Zandvoort, in the vicinity of Haarlem, to Scheveningen, were also severely bombarded on the 28th of September, and many vessels destroyed.

Early in the year, a singular overture was made by Buonaparte, to Louis XVIII. at Warsaw, for the resignation of that monarch's right to the throne of France; an overture, which was met by a most decided and highly dignified refusal.

The strongest opposition which the Addingtonian ministry experienced, was that of Lord Grenville, and his friends, in the Upper House of Parliament, and Mr. Windham, in the House of Commons. The whigs, or old opposition, though they had supported the treaty of Amiens, felt no cordiality towards a mi-

* Buonaparte, anxious to push the advantages he possessed, to the utmost possible extent, issued a decree, prohibiting the navigation of the rivers Elbe and Weser, by the vessels of British merchants, asserting, that as the fortune of war had given him the possession of the King of England's dominions in Hanover, it was not to be expected that the enemy's ships would be allowed to pass within reach of a French battery. The British government replied, that the conduct of France, in the invasion of the electorate, was an unauthorised and outrageous violation of the independence of the German empire; that it would be an act of hostility, in Germany, to permit British vessels to be fired at, or captured, when navigating in the ports or rivers of Germany; and therefore (retaliating, in some degree, on the empire, for not having defended Hanover) measures were taken to enforce a rigorous blockade upon the mouth of the Elbe and the Weser, and to prevent the navigation of those rivers so long as British vessels were excluded from them. The Hanse Towns were thus placed in a most deplorable situation. By the blockade of their harbours, all foreign trade was cut off, while the neighbourhood of the French armies placed them in perpetual danger of military violence and exaction. In this situation, they addressed themselves to the King of Prussia, as guarantee and protector of the north of Germany; but Frederick-William, either entering into the views of France, or influenced by the consideration of its vast and resistless power, refused his interference, and thus abandoned all the smaller states of Germany to the mercy and discretion of the republic.

nistry, who had, as they conceived, again involved the country in an unnecessary war; and the adherents of Mr. Pitt, relaxing that zealous support, which Mr. Addington expected, were no longer to be classed among the supporters of his government.

About the beginning of April, Mr. Addington made a proposal to Mr. Pitt, the object of which was the return of the ex-minister to the official situation which he formally held. This negociation had proceeded nearly towards its close, when Mr. Pitt intimated, that in the general arrangement for a new administration, which he should feel it his duty to submit to his Majesty, he should include the Lords Grenville and Spencer, with other noblemen and honourable personages, who had disapproved of every measure of Mr. Addington's government, and who were in effect adverse to the whole spirit and principle of his administration. With this proposal ministers could not comply; and, consequently, the negociation was broken off.

Parliament assembled on the 22d of November; and, in the speech from the throne, his Majesty, addressed himself to the two Houses of Parliament, as follows:—

"Since I last met you in Parliament, it has been my chief object to carry into effect those measures, which your wisdom had adopted for the defence of the united kingdom, and for the vigorous prosecution of the war. In these preparations I have been seconded by the voluntary exertions of all ranks of my people, in a manner that has, if possible, strengthened their claims to my confidence and affection: they have shewn that the menaces of the enemy have only served to rouse their native hereditary spirit; and that all other considerations are lost in a general disposition to make those efforts and sacrifices which the honour and safety of the kingdom demand, at this important and critical juncture." After congratulating Parliament on the accession made to the colonial possessions of this country in the West Indies; and of the happy suppression of the rebellion in Ireland; and informing them that a convention had been concluded with the King of Sweden, for the purpose of adjusting the differences which had arisen with that power, his Majesty proceeded thus:—"In the prosecution of the contest in which we are engaged, it shall be, as it has ever been, my first object, to execute as becomes me the great trust committed to my charge. Embarked with my brave and loyal people in one common cause, it is my fixed determination, if the occasion should arise, to share their exertions and their dangers in the defence of our constitution, our religion, our laws, and our independence. To the activity and valour of my fleets and armies, to the zeal and unconquerable spirit of my faithful subjects, I confide the honour of my crown, and all those valuable interests which are involved in this momentous contest. Actuated by these sentiments, and humbly imploring the blessings of Divine Providence, I look forward with a firm conviction, that if, contrary to all just expectation, the enemy should elude the vigilance of my numerous fleets and cruisers, and attempt to execute their presumptuous threat of invading our coasts, the consequence will be to them discomfiture, confusion, and disgrace; and that ours will not only be the glory of surmounting the present difficulties, and repelling immediate danger, but the solid and permanent advantage, of fixing the safety and independence of the kingdom on the basis of acknowledged strength, the result of its own tried energy and resources."

The address, moved by the Marquis of Sligo, and seconded by the Earl of Limerick, was carried without opposition. In the Commons, the address was proposed by the Honourable Cropley Ashley, seconded by Mr. Burland, and carried without any amendment being proposed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, to some observations from Mr. Fox, that the offices of mediation had been offered by the court of Russia, and accepted with readiness and gratitude on the part of his Majesty's servants; but although discussions of the greatest moment were in consequence commenced, yet in their progress they did not assume such a shape as to lead to any probability of an amicable arrangement with France.

Shortly after the commencement of the session, Mr. Secretary Yorke brought in a bill to continue two acts; the one for suspending the Habeas Corpus act in Ireland, and the other for the re-enactment of martial law in that country. This measure, though it excited considerable debate, was carried through both Houses, without producing a single division. The debate which arose on the 9th of December, on the motion of the Secretary at War, to refer the army estimates to a committee of supply, embraced an extensive view of the general defence of the country. The force proposed to be voted for the public service, amounted, for guards and garrisons in the united kingdom, to 167,000 men. The embodied militia of Great Britain and Ireland, amounted to 110,000. And the volunteer corps, to upwards of 400,000 rank and file in the united kingdom. For the volunteer force of the country, it was proposed to vote the sum of 730,000*l.* for one year. Of this description of force, the honourable gentleman stated, that about 45,000 served without pay, including 42,000 infantry, and 2,509 cavalry.

The question being put upon the first resolution, Mr. Windham rose, and in a long and well combined speech, attacked the whole plan of government; concluding with the declaration, that the present ministers ought no longer to be intrusted with the administration of our public affairs. Mr. Yorke replied to Mr. Windham, and was followed by Mr. Pitt, who, in a very spirited and argumentative manner, defended the efficiency of the volunteer system. One great object of Mr. Pitt's speech was to demonstrate the capability of improvement of which the volunteer corps were susceptible; and he took occasion to suggest those means which appeared to him best calculated to advance that object. He looked upon the regular army as the great rallying point to which the volunteers must have recourse, by whose example they must be regulated, and by whose experience they must be guided. Of the amount of the volunteer force he saw no reason to complain; but in their distribution he could have wished that their numbers had been greater in the more exposed parts of the maritime coast. The object he had more immediately in view, was to render this force, the existence of which was absolutely necessary, not merely a nominal force, but an efficient and permanent army. For this purpose, he was desirous that all the volunteer companies should be brought to act in battalions, and whenever it could be accomplished, in brigades. He also proposed, to give to every battalion the assistance of a field officer, and an adjutant; such officers still retaining their rank and pay in the army. With respect to the number of days for which the corps should be exercised, he was of opinion that about fifty days would be sufficient for the next year, and forty for each succeeding year. The expense arising from the field-officers and adjutants, he estimated at about 160,000*l.* and that of the allowance to such volunteers as might, from their circumstances, be obliged to accept of pay, at between 3 and 400,000*l.* more, making an aggregate of about 500,000*l.* And if, for that sum, a force of nearly 400,000 men could be maintained in gradual and efficient improvement, he affirmed, that this would be the cheapest item in the whole of the public expenditure. As to the sea fencibles, he looked upon them as one of the most valuable parts of our force; and this description of service brought into activity a body of men, who being chiefly pilots and fishermen, could neither be employed in the navy, nor permanently taken from their families.

Lord Castlereagh also made an animated reply to the objections urged by Mr. Windham against the army of reserve and the volunteer system. He said, that out of the 35,000 already raised for the army of reserve, 7,500 had entered for general service. The military force of the united kingdom, his Lordship observed, was naturally divided into troops on permanent pay, and those liable to service in the event of invasion. Of the first description, there were in Great Britain, and in the islands of Guernsey and Jersey, 130,000 men; and in Ireland.

Ireland, 50,000 men; making in the whole, 180,000 rank and file. The effective rank and file of the militia in Great Britain and Ireland, amounted to 84,000 men; the regular force, to 96,000; of which 27,000 were for limited service; and 69,000, at this moment, disposable for general service. The next grand feature of our military strength consisted in the volunteer force, of which 340,000 men, accepted and arrayed, were at present in Great Britain; and in Ireland, it amounted to 70,000; making a total of 410,000 in rank and file, in the united kingdom; to which were to be added, 25,000 sea fencibles. The total amount of the whole military force, at this crisis, stood therefore at 615,000 rank and file. If to this number officers of every description were added, the whole amount of our military force, exclusive of various auxiliary means of defence, would not be less than 700,000 men! The number of ships of war amounted to 469; and, in aid of the regular navy, and for the purpose of defending the coast, an armed flotilla, consisting of 800 craft of all descriptions, was nearly completed. Since the commencement of hostilities, there had been issued 312,009 muskets, 16,000 pistols, and 77,000 pikes. The field-train also, in Great Britain alone, was increased from 356 to 460 pieces of ordnance, completely appointed, and brigaded under experienced officers; and the stores, in all the various branches of the public service, had been nearly doubled. Mr. Fox applauded the zeal and patriotism of the volunteers; but he could never bring himself to believe, that they were susceptible of any thing like the efficiency of a regular force. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the other hand, stated the opinion of Lord Moira, the commander-in-chief in Scotland, and of Lord Cathcart, the present commander-in-chief in Ireland. These great military authorities were so highly satisfied with the steadiness and discipline of the volunteers of Edinburgh and of Dublin, that they had given them an unconditional assurance, that they would conduct them with confidence against an invading host.

The army estimates having been agreed to, Parliament, on the 20th of December, adjourned to the 1st of February.

A. D. 1804.] During the recess, the nation experienced a serious alarm, by the renewed indisposition of the King: on the 14th of February, it was announced, by an official bulletin, from the palace of St. James's, that his Majesty was much indisposed; and a succession of similar notices left little doubt of the serious nature of the complaint. The alarm and consternation thus excited throughout the metropolis, and the whole empire, cannot be expressed. On the 27th of February, twelve days after the notification of his Majesty's illness, the first bulletin appeared, which could be said to hold out any prospect of its favourable or speedy termination. This consolatory information was followed, on the 29th, by the declaration in Parliament of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, "that there was no necessary suspension of the royal functions." It was not, however, till the 9th of March, that the apprehensions of the people were dissipated, by the further assurance of the Lord Chancellor, "that he had conceived it proper and necesary to have a personal interview with the sovereign, at which due discussion had taken place with respect to the bills submitted for the royal assent; and he had no hesitation to aver, that the result of all that took place on that occasion, fully justified him in announcing his Majesty's assent to the bills specified in the royal commission."

The conflicts of parties still continued, with much heat and animosity. On the 7th of March, Sir John Wrottesley made a motion for the House of Commons to resolve itself into a committee, to inquire into the conduct of the Irish government relative to the insurrection of the 23d of July, 1803, and the previous conduct of the Irish government, so far as related to that insurrection. This motion was supported by Mr. Fox, Mr. Canning, Earl Temple, Mr. Windham, General Tarleton, Dr. Lawrence, Lord de Blaquiere, and Mr. Grey; and opposed by Lord Castlereagh, Mr. Archdall, Mr. Dawson, Mr. Secretary Yorke, Mr. Dallas, the Attorney General, Mr. Tierney, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Colonel Hutchinson, on the ground that the intent of the motion was to attack Lord Hardwicke, at a time when his whole attention was occupied in the administration of the affairs of Ireland. The debate was protracted till near five o'clock on the following morning, when the motion was lost by a majority of one hundred and seventy-eight to eighty-two voices.* When the restriction of the issues of cash by the bank of Ireland was submitted to the House of Commons, on the 13th of February, it occasioned an animated debate, and called forth a maiden speech from Lord Henry Petty, eldest son of the Marquis of Lansdowne, in which his Lordship displayed considerable talents.

On the 26th of March, a message from his Majesty announced a voluntary offer of the Irish militia to extend their services to Great Britain; and, two days afterwards, an address, grounded on its recommendation, was moved by Mr. Yorke; and bills ultimately passed both Houses of Parliament, to enable his Majesty to accept the services of the Irish militia, and to raise 10,000 additional militia in Ireland.

A systematic attack on the ministry was at this time pursued by all the parties in opposition, through the medium of investigations on the military and naval affairs of the empire. This opposition was particularly displayed in the progress of a bill to explain, amend, and consolidate the provisions contained in the general acts relative to the yeomanry and volunteer corps of the united kingdom. The course of debate on this bill, however, was interrupted by a motion of which Mr. Pitt had before given notice, on a subject of much higher interest—the naval defence of the country; a question which was expected more than any other to try the strength of ministry, and even to shake their power to its foundation. This motion was introduced on the 15th of March, and Mr. Pitt began by expressing his expectation, that part of the documents which it was his intention to call for, would be granted by ministers without resistance. His first motion, he said, would be for an address, requesting that his Majesty would order to be laid before Parliament, an account of the number of ships of the line, and smaller vessels, in commission on the 31st of December, 1793, on the 30th of September, 1801, and on the 31st of December, 1803, specifying the service in which they were respectively employed. He made his motion from a conviction, that if the papers were granted, it would appear that the number of that description of our naval force, fit to repel the actual attempts of the enemy, was, at the present moment, much inferior, and less adequate to the exigency of the danger, than at any period in former times. If these documents were granted, his next motion would be for a copy of the contracts made, and the orders given by the Lords of the Admiralty, in 1793, 1797, and 1803, with respect to the number of gun vessels to be built, distinguishing the time at which each contract was made, the period in which it was to be brought to a conclusion, and the amount of the sum to be paid for its performance. This account would shew the opinion of the Lords of the Admiralty on the subject, and would also afford the means of comparing our naval strength in this respect, as it actually existed, with what it was in former instances, and tend most essentially to promote that end for which we could not be too zealous in our wishes—the security of the country. Mr. Pitt said, that since the present Lords of the Admiralty came into office, only two ships of the line had been contracted for in the merchants' yards, and his next motion should therefore be, that there be laid before the House a list of such ships as had been built in the king's yards in 1793, and in 1801. On the subject of manning the navy, he observed, that in the former war we set out with 16,000 men, but in the course of the year they were increased to the number of 75,000, including marines. In the present war we started with 50,000 men, and had all the great advantages arising from an unprecedented prosperity of trade and commerce, and yet at the end of the year our naval force did not exceed 86,000 men. Thus in the first year of the former war, we had an increase of 60,000 seamen, and in the first year of the present war, an augmentation of only 36,000.

Mr. Tierney, treasurer of the navy, objected strongly to the production of the papers required, and was at a loss to conceive how the measure could, for a single instant, be entertained by the House, when no cause, no single fact, was brought forward to support it; when every possible energy pervaded that branch of the public service over which the noble Lord presided; when naval skill, vigilance, and activity, were displayed in every quarter, and when the best officers were employed in every direction, with the highest honour to themselves, and the most decided advantage to their country.

Mr. Sheridan delivered a warm eulogy, in general terms, on the character and conduct of Earl St. Vincent, the First Lord of the Admiralty; whilst Mr. Fox, and others, taking a different side, supported the motion for enquiry, under the declared conviction, that it would terminate to the honour of their favourite Admiral. The debate was continued for several hours; when, on a division, the numbers were, for Mr. Pitt's motion, 130; against it, 201.

The defence of the country, however, was the great rock on which the Addingtonian administration was destined to split. On the 23d of April, Mr. Fox moved for a committee to revise the several bills which had been proposed for the accomplishment of this great object; and for devising efficient measures for complete and permanent defence. Mr. Pitt supported this motion, and again took a comprehensive view of the actual state of the country, as to its means of military and of naval defence. There was but one point on which he and Mr. Fox differed on this occasion; the power vested in the King by the Constitution, of calling out all the subjects of his realm to defend the country in case of invasion. Mr. Fox was, perhaps, the first statesman who ever ventured to question the royal prerogative, in this particular. For nothing is more clearly laid down by all our law writers, ancient and modern, than that the power of calling on every description of his subjects to repair to his standard, when the enemy is about to invade his country, is vested in the King. It is a principle sanctioned too, by the practice, as well as by the theory, of our constitution; and a principle conducive to the security of the nation. Mr. Pitt asserted and maintained this principle against the attacks of Mr. Fox. On all other points those rival statesmen agreed, and the results of this concurrence of sentiment was a strong division, in which the ministers carried the question against the motion, by a majority of only fifty-two; two hundred and four having voted for the motion of Mr. Fox, and two hundred and fifty-six against it. Two days after this discussion, on the 25th of April, another debate took place on the same subject, in consequence of a motion by Mr. Secretary Yorke, for the House to resolve itself into a committee, on a bill for the suspension of the army of reserve act. This motion was resisted by Mr. Pitt; and, on a division, there appeared, in support of the ministerial plan, 240; against it 203; leaving to the minister, a majority of only thirty-seven. This additional mark of dissatisfaction with the conduct of ministers proved the death blow to their expiring power. They immediately tendered their resignations, and the King consigned to Mr. Pitt the task of forming a new administration. When the strength of that cabinet, over which Mr. Pitt had before presided for so many years was considered, nothing appeared more easy than the formation of a new ministry. It was naturally imagined, that those statesmen who had so long, and so cordially, united their efforts to preserve the state from danger in the most perilous times, would be ready again to stand forward in her support, and to resume, in obedience to the call of their Sovereign, the same situations which they had so ably and so honourably filled before. Unhappily, it appeared that, since their secession from power, these noble persons had formed some new connections, or, at least, had imbibed some new ideas, respecting the materials of which a new administration ought to be formed. They thought, that no ministry could be efficient, unless it were composed of the leading members of the three parties in Parliament;—those of Mr. Pitt, of Mr. Fox, and of Lord Grenville. Mr. Pitt had no objection, if it should be the King's wish, to admit Mr. Fox into the cabinet; but his Majesty peremptorily objected to this proposal. Mr. Pitt urged his reasons, with becoming firmness, for the expediency of comprising Mr. Fox in the New Ministry; but he did not think it compatible with his duty as a subject, nor decorous in him as a statesman, to press this point more strongly upon the King, much less to make it the ground of withholding his own services from his sovereign and his country. Lord Grenville, however, and his associates, remained firm to their purpose, and rendered a compliance with their wishes the sine qua non of their return to office. Mr. Pitt, at length, obeyed the royal commands; and by the 12th of May, a new ministry was formed, without the assistance of the friends either of Lord Grenville, or of Mr. Fox.*

The first subject of importance that engaged the attention of Parliament, after the change of ministry, was brought under discussion by Mr. Wilberforce, who, on the 30th of May, pressed upon the consideration of the House the abolition of the African slave trade. In the course of a very animated debate, several members opposed the motion, which was supported by Mr. Fox and Mr. Pitt, and carried, by 124 to 49 voices. In consequence of this vote, a bill was brought into Parliament for the abolition of the slave trade, limiting the latest period at which ships were to be allowed to clear out from an English port for this traffic to the 1st of October, 1804. On the 28th of June, the third reading of this bill was carried by 69 against 33. In the House of Lords, however, the bill was, on the 30th of July, thrown out, without a division, on the ground that the late period of the session would prevent the parties interested from attaining complete justice.

A plan for raising and supporting a permanent military force, and for the general reduction of the additional militia, was introduced into Parliament on the 5th of June, by Mr. Pitt, under the designation of the "additional force act." This measure aimed at the establishment of a military force, not merely to meet the present circumstances of the country, but to serve as an instrument for the intermediate improvement of the system already established, and to supply a sufficient resource to the regular force of the country, should an opportunity offer of employing our troops in foreign warfare. The bill was strenuously opposed by Mr. Windham, Mr. Fox, Mr. Addington, and others, but it was ultimately carried through the Lower House by small ministerial majorities; there appearing on the last division, for the bill, 265, against it 223. In the Upper House, the measure was sanctioned by 154 against 69.

* The Cabinet was composed of Mr. Pitt, First Lord of the Treasury, and Chancellor of the Exchequer; Duke of Portland, President of the Council; Lord Eldon, Lord Chancellor; Earl of Westmoreland, Lord Privy Seal; Lord Viscount Melville, First Lord of the Admiralty; Earl of Chatham, Master General of the Ordnance. Lord Hawkesbury, Secretary of State for the Home Department, Lord Harrowby, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; Earl Camden, Secretary of State for the Department of War, and the Colonies; Lord Castlereagh, President of the Board of Controul for the affairs of India; and Lord Mulgrave, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Mr. William Dundas, was made Secretary at War, Mr. Canning, Treasurer of the Navy; Mr. George Rose and Lord Charles Somerset, Joint Paymaster of the Forces; the Duke of Montrose and Lord Charles Spencer, Joint Paymaster General; Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Sturgess Bourne, Secretaries of the Treasury; Sir William Grant, Master of the Rolls; Mr. Perceval, Attorney General; Sir Thomas Manners Sutton, Solicitor General; Lord Hardwicke, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; Lord Redesdale, Lord Chancellor, Sir Evan Nepean, Chief Secretary, and Mr. Corry, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The remaining part of the session was principally employed on the subjects of commerce and finance;* and on the 2d of July, the House of Commons, on the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, resolved itself into a committee of supply, to which several accounts relative to the augmentation of the civil list were referred; when the arrears thereof were found to amount to the sum of 590,000*l*. This excess of expenditure, it was stated, had arisen from a variety of expenses incurred by services which could not be foreseen in the year 1802, when the House voted the discharge of arrears then due, amounting to about 230,000*l*. With respect to the future state of the civil list, it was proposed that several charges upon it should be annually discharged by Parliament. These charges amounted to 135,000*l*, and related to fluctuating expences; many of them arose from the war, others from increased law expences, and the multiplication of private bills. The House readily assented to the propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; the discharge of the arrears, and the augmentation to the civil list, were voted almost without opposition; and, on the 31st of July, the session closed.

The first military operation of importance this year, occurred in the English settlement of the island of Goree, on the coast of Africa. In the month of January, this settlement was taken by a French force, under the command of Chevalier Malhe, and recaptured by a small expedition under the command of Captain Edward Sterling Dickson, in the month of March following. In the beginning of May, the rich and important colony of Surinam surrendered to the force under the command of Major-General Sir Charles Green; and although the capture was an enterprise of considerable difficulty, this valuable acquisition was fortunately made with little loss on the part of his Majesty's troops.†

The British naval operations of this year consisted almost entirely of exertions rigorously to enforce the system of blockade, and in attacks upon the enemy's boats, which either ventured out of the harbour of Boulogne, for the purposes of exercise or menace, or were proceeding from other ports to that depot. It was, however, impossible, to obviate the effects of occasional rumours of invasion. In the month of August a general movement on the opposite coast exhibited every appearance of an approaching attack upon some part of the British empire, and at Boulogne in particular, an extraordinary degree of activity prevailed. Of the various description of craft and armed vessels collected in that immense depot, a much greater number was brought out into the bay of Boulogne than on any former occasion. Disposed in hostile array, under the protection of their numerous batteries on shore, they were attacked in the most spirited and vigorous manner by the British squadron upon that station. The firing was tremendous, and its duration was such as to favour the belief, that the long threatened invasion was at this time to be certainly attempted, Under the influence of this impression the most vigorous and general exertions were made for the public safety. In the early part of September the general terror began to subside. About the beginning of October, however, about 150 of the enemy's vessels ventured on the outside of the pier, and revived the alarm of invasion. At this period, a project for the destruction of the French flotilla was broached; from which a result was anticipated that would at once confound the designs of the enemy, and establish the superiority of the present administration over their predecessors in office. This plan, originating with some American projector, was principally to be carried into effect through the medium of copper vessels, of an oblong form, containing a large quantity of combustibles, and so constructed as to explode in a given time, by means of clock-work. These vessels were to be fastened to the bottom of the enemy's gun boats by the aid of a small raft, rowed by one man, who, being seated up to the chin in water, might possibly in a dark night escape detection. Fire-ships of different constructions were also to be employed in the projected attack. The most active and enterprising officers were

* On the 20th of June, the complex and difficult subject of the corn laws was brought under discussion. It has been maintained by many respectable authorities conversant in the subject of national polity, that the whole system of the corn laws is prejudicial to the public weal, and that it is desirable that these laws should be altogether repealed, leaving the trade free, and the prices to find their own level; but in consequence of a report of the House of Commons, it was deemed expedient to have recourse to new legislative regulations. From the report of this committee, it appeared that the price of corn, from 1791 to the harvest of 1803, had been irregular; but had upon an average yielded a fair price to the grower. The high prices had produced the effect of stimulating industry, and bringing into cultivation large tracts of waste land; which, combined with the two last productive seasons, had occasioned such a depreciation in the value of grain, as would, it was said, tend to the discouragement of agriculture, unless immediate relief were afforded by the interference of Parliament. For this purpose, although, within the period of the last thirteen years, no less than thirty millions sterling had been paid to foreign countries for supplies of grain, it was proposed to have recourse to a bounty upon exportation—a measure that had not been resorted to for a period of nearly thirty years. With this view a bill was brought into Parliament. Exportation was to be admitted when the price of wheat was at or below forty-eight shillings per quarter of eight Winchester bushels; and importation was to be allowed when the average price in the twelve maritime counties of England should exceed sixty-three shillings, but not when corn was below that price. It was held, that this bill was necessary in order to encourage the agriculture of the country; it was also presumed that the measure would render corn permanently cheap, by combining the interest of the grower with that of the consumer. And upon the whole it was argued, that the true way to prevent the recurrence of scarcity, was to remove the danger of such a depreciation in the value of corn, as might discourage the farmer from producing full crops. It was on the other hand contended, that the effect of the act founded on the bill now before the House, would be to fix a minimum upon the first necessary of life, and that, if the interest of the grower of corn was to be protected by a minimum, the interest of the consumer of that article should be guarded by a maximum. That as to the idea of the act making the corn cheap, it was at variance with the professed object of the bill, which was to serve the grower by keeping up the prices. And that the experience of the past had shewn, what the evidence of the future would confirm, that the effect of all measures of this nature was to advance the price of corn, and with that article to enhance the price of every other article of general consumption. The bill, however, passed through the House of Commons without any formidable opposition. In the House of Lords some few petitions were presented against the bill, which Earl Stanhope designated as a bill to starve the poor. On the second reading, his Lordship proposed three resolutions:—"First, that public granaries should be established, to receive, in years of plenty, corn and grain grown in this country, in order to keep down the prices in years of scarcity, and effectually to secure to this nation, in all seasons, a sufficient supply, and likewise in order to provide for the farmers at all times a certain market for their corn and grain, and to diminish fluctuation in the price of the necessaries of life.

"Second, That all impediments, created by any law or laws, to the free warehousing of corn or grain, ought to be removed, abolished, and repealed; and

"Third, That in order to encourage the growth of corn and grain in Great Britain and Ireland, and at the same to decrease the price, for the benefit of the people at large, and for the increase of our manufactures and commerce, farmers should be for ever discharged from the payment of all direct taxes, parish and county rates, cesses, dues, and tythes, and from all Parliamentary impositions whatever; save only and except those rates of the nature of a penalty, which might be raised on any hundred as such."

His Lordship supported these resolutions, by arguments applicable to each, and concluded by moving, that the bill now before the House be rejected. The bill, however, was passed.

† Early in the spring, the country sustained a heavy loss in the wreck of the Apollo frigate, of thirty-eight guns, Captain Dixon, and a large portion of her convoy. The Apollo had sailed from the Cove of Cork, on the 26th of March, in company with his Majesty's ship Carysford, charged with the convoy of sixty-nine merchant vessels, bound for the West Indies. About half past three o'clock in the morning of Monday, the 2d of April, the Apollo, with part of her convoy, went on shore, off Cape Mondego, on the coast of Portugal. The frigate soon became a complete wreck. The captain, who, with the principal part of his crew had been driven from their hammocks by the sudden rushing in of the water, stood naked upon the deck, soothing and affording every encouragement to the men in their perilous situation. About thirty of the crew, after encountering the most imminent danger, had the good fortune to gain the shore on planks and spars from the wreck; while others, in making similar attempts, perished, and of that number was the Captain. At length, after encountering, for three days and nights, the complicated horrors of fatigue, famine, and despair, the survivors had the great happiness to see a boat launched through the surf to their relief, and to find themselves, by four o'clock in the afternoon of Wednesday, in safety on the shore of Mondego. About forty sail of merchantmen shared the fate of the Apollo, and the number of lives lost upon this melancholy occasion exceeded five hundred. Of the sixty-nine merchant ships, twenty-nine escaped the horrors of shipwreck, and proceeded, under convoy of the Carysford, to their original destination.

distributed in different explosion vessels, and the whole was placed under the orders and direction of Admiral Lord Keith, commanding in the Downs, with instructions to cover the smaller force by his powerful squadron. On the 2d of October, Admiral Lord Keith, with his formidable fleet of sixty-two sail, six of which were ships of the line, anchored at about a league and a half from the north to the west of the port of Boulogne. In the course of the day, a sufficient force was detached to take up an advanced and convenient anchorage for covering the retreat, and for affording protection to the wounded, or to such boats as might be crippled; or, should the wind freshen and blow in shore, to tow off the boats engaged in the attack. While these preparations were advancing, the enemy was not inactive; the batteries, both stationary and floating, were prepared, and the army was drawn up in readiness to resist the approaching assault. At a quarter past nine at night, the first detachment of fire-ships was launched, under a heavy fire from the advanced force, which was returned by a tremendous thunder of artillery from the shore. As the fire-ships approached the French line, the vessels of the flotilla opened to suffer them to pass, and so effectually were they avoided, that they sailed to the rear of the enemy's line without falling on board any one of their vessels. At half-past ten the first explosion ship blew up, and produced an immense column of fire; its wreck spread in every direction, but not the slightest mischief was done either to the ships or the batteries. A second, a third, and a fourth succeeded, but with no better effect: at length, after twelve of these ships had exploded, the engagement ceased about four o'clock the next morning, when the English smaller vessels withdrew in perfect order, and without the loss of a man. On the flotilla no mischief whatever was ascertained to have been inflicted; but, from the disappearance of two brigs, and some smaller vessels, the next day, Lord Keith conjectured that they might have been destroyed. The enemy's loss of men, according to their own account, was twenty-five killed and wounded. Thus terminated the "Catamaran Project," in the preparation of which, much time, expense, and ingenuity were wasted.

As soon as the intelligence of the renewal of the war, between Great Britain and France arrived in the East Indies, the French Admiral Linois withdrew from the roads of Pondicherry, and for some time carried on a predatory warfare against the English commerce and possessions in that part of the globe. He captured several of the East India Company's ships, and others of the private trade, and he had also made a successful descent on Fort Marlborough (Bencoolen), and plundered that settlement. He next formed the determination to capture or destroy, at a single blow, the whole of the homeward-bound China fleet. With this intention he collected his force, consisting of the Marengo, line-of-battle-ship, of 80 guns, the Semillante and Bellepoule, of 40 guns, a cutter and brigantine, of eighteen guns, and a corvette, of 28 guns, and stationed his squadron in the Indian Seas, near the entrance of the Straits of Molacca, with the determination to cruise in that latitude till the arrival of the English East India fleet from Canton. On the 5th of February, the fleet, under the command of Captain Dance, as senior commander, consisting of fifteen of the East India Company's ships from China, twelve country ships, a Portuguese East Indiaman, and a fast sailing brig, passed Macao Roads, when the Portuguese vessel, and one of the Company's ships, parted company, and never again joined the fleet. At day-break on the 14th, Pulo Auro was seen to the W. S. W. and at eight o'clock, the Royal George made a signal, indicating that four strange sail were in view, which, on being reconnoitred, proved to be the squadron under Admiral Linois. The Commodore, without a moment's delay, hoisted the signal for his fleet to form a line of battle in close order. At sun-set, the enemy was close upon the rear of the Company's ships, and an expectation prevailed that the attack would be immediately commenced, but at the close of the day the French hauled to windward, and desisted from any hostile operation during the night. At day-break on the 15th, the enemy was seen about three miles to windward, when the vessels under the command of Captain Dance hoisted their colours, and offered him battle. At one o'clock in the afternoon, the Commodore, resolving not to wait the attack, and apprehensive that his rear might be cut off, executed a bold and gallant manœuvre, which decided the fate of the day. Placing the Royal George in front of his line, seconded by the Ganges, and followed by the Earl Camden, he bore down upon the enemy, and made the signal to attack each of the hostile ships in succession. This order being correctly performed, the Company's ships stood forward under a press of sail. Admiral Linois then formed in close line, and opened his fire upon the headmost of the merchant-ships, which was not returned by any of them till a near approach. The Royal George, from her advanced situation, sustained the brunt of the action, and got as near the enemy as he would permit. This example was followed by the Ganges and Earl Camden, who both opened their fire as soon as their guns could take effect; but, before any other ship could get into action, the enemy hauled their wind, and stood away to the eastward under all the sail they could set. At two o'clock, p. m. Captain Dance made a signal for a general chase, and pursued the retreating squadron till past four o'clock; when, fearing a longer pursuit might carry him too far from the straits, and endanger the immense property confided to his care, he made the signal to tack, and at eight o'clock in the evening, anchored in a situation to proceed for the entrance of the straits on the following day. Thus did the gallantry of a fleet of British merchantmen, and the skill and intrepidity of their commander, bring to action, and put to flight, a French Admiral, commanding ships of war superior in force and in men. The property thus rescued from the gripe of the enemy was estimated at the immense amount of one million and a half sterling. On the arrival of Commodore Dance with his fleet in England, rewards were distributed with a liberal hand by the East India Company to the various Commanders and their brave crews; and the wounded, as well as the representatives of the few who fell in the engagement, were munificently rewarded; while the sovereign, to evince the sense he entertained of the gallant conduct of the Commodore, conferred upon him the honour of knighthood.

After a long negociation between the courts of Madrid and London, begun in the autumn of the year 1802, and continued till towards the close of the present year, the British plenipotentiary found it necessary to quit Madrid, and repair to London. While the negociations, however, were pending in the Spanish capital, Admiral Cochrane acquainted the First Lord of the Admiralty, that preparations on a large scale were at that moment making in the port of Ferrol, so that in a few days a formidable squadron would be ready for sea; and that he had no doubt but the Spanish government only waited for the arrival of a fleet of frigates, containing treasures from South America, to commence open hostilities. On the receipt of this information, orders were instantly given by the Admiralty to detain the ships bound from South America to Spain, and Captain Moore, with four frigates under his command, was ordered to cruise off Cadiz, for the purpose of carrying these instructions into effect. On the 5th of October, the Medusa made a signal for four sail, and a general chase was ordered. At eight in the morning, the vessels first seen by the Medusa, were discovered to be four large Spanish frigates, which, on finding themselves pursued, formed in line of battle, and continued to steer in for Cadiz, the van-ship carrying a broad pendant, and the ship next in the line, a Rear-Admiral's flag. Captain Gore, of the Medusa, placed that ship on the weather-beam of the Spanish Commodore; the Indefatigable took a similar position along-side of the Rear-Admiral; and the Amphion and Lively each took an opponent as they advanced. After firing a shot ahead of the Rear-Admiral's ship he shortened sail, upon which Lieutenant Ascott, of the Indefatigable, was sent sent to inform the Spanish Commander that Captain Moore had orders to detain his squadron; that it was his earnest wish to execute that duty without bloodshed; but that the determination to surrender must be made instantly. The answer returned by Lieutenant Ascott was unsatisfactory; whereupon Captain Moore fired another shot a-head of the Admiral, and bore down close on his weather-bow. At this moment one of the Spanish frigates fired into the Amphion, and the Admiral, at the same time, fired into the Indefatigable. A signal was then made for close battle, which instantly commenced; and, in less than ten minutes, La Mercedes, the Admiral's second ship a-stern, blew up, along side of the Amphion, with a tremendous explosion.* In less than half an hour the Spanish Admiral's ship struck to Captain Sutton, as did the opponent of the Lively to that ship. Perceiving, at this moment, the Spanish Commodore making off, Captain Moore made the signal for the Lively, Captain Hammond, to join the Medusa in the chase; and long before sun-set it was discovered, from the mast-head of the Indefatigable, that the only remaining ship had surrendered to the Medusa and Lively. As soon as the boats of the British squadron had taken possession of the Rear-Admiral, sail was made for the floating fragments of the Mercedes; but except the second Captain, and forty-five men, who were picked up by the boats of the Amphion, all on board had perished. The Spanish squadron, it appeared, was commanded by Don Joseph Bustamente, Knight of the Order of St. James, and a Rear-Admiral in the Spanish navy. This fleet was from Monte Video, Rio de la Plata, and contained upwards of four millions of dollars, of which about 800,000 were on board the Mercedes; and the merchandise on board the frigate was also of great value. The loss sustained by the British on this occasion was very trifling. A declaration of war, by the court of Madrid, was the immediate consequence of this attack.

Sweden and Russia had already expressed their dissatisfaction at the conduct of Buonaparte; fresh circumstances were continually arising which tended to convert this dissatisfaction into actual hostility; and the appointment of Lord Leveson Gower, as Ambassador to the court of St. Petersburgh, increased the public expectation of a speedy continental alliance, upon the most advantageous terms.

About this time, information was received by government of the successful termination of hostilities in the peninsula of Hindostan; an event which served to dissipate the apprehensions generally felt for the stability of the British empire in the East, and to relieve the country from the necessity of weakening our army at home, by detaching troops to India.†

* It is melancholy to state, that, in the Mercedes was embarked a native of Spain, who was returning from South America, with his whole family, consisting of his lady, four daughters, and five sons. The daughters were beautiful and amiable women, the sons grown up to manhood. With such a family, and a large fortune, the gradual savings of five and twenty years of industry, did this unhappy Spaniard embark for the land of his nativity. A short time before the action commenced, the father, with one of his sons, went on board one of the larger ships, and, in a few moments, became the spectator of his wife, his daughters, four of his sons, and all his treasure, surrounded with flames, and sinking in the abyss of the ocean. This victim of almost unheard of calamity, arrived at Plymouth, with the only remains of so many blessings, in Captain Moore's cabin, who was unceasing in his endeavours to administer all in his power towards the alleviation of his sufferings.

† According to the statement of the Marquis Wellesley, a number of the confederated Mahratta chieftains had assembled their military force on the frontiers of our ally, the Soubahdar of the Deccan, after having declared that the intention of that junction was to decide, whether there should be peace or war with the British government and its allies. The determination of the chieftains to maintain this position, was regarded by the Governor-General as a manifest indication of a design to frustrate, by hostilities, or by the terror of arms, the operations of the alliance concluded between the British government and the Peishwah, to disturb the tranquillity of the Nizam, and ultimately of the East India Company. The union of the confederated forces, and their commanding and menacing position, afforded every advantage to the chieftains in prosecuting the hostile designs which they had already exhibited, and enabled them to hold in their hands the issues of peace or war, and to arbitrate the fate of the Deccan according to their interests and caprice. While the position and state of Scindiah's forces, under the command of French officers, in Hindostan, and the machinations of Monsieur Perron, the nominal representative of the deposed Moghul emperor, with the adjoining states, and with the subjects of the Company, and of the Vizier, manifested additional proofs of the hostile designs of the confederates, and furnished those chieftains with additional means of prosecuting their designs.

War having been determined on, the plan of the campaign was arranged for a general and combined attack to be made nearly at the same time on the united army of Scindiah and the Rajah of Berar, under their personal command, in the Deccan, and on their most vulnerable and valuable possessions in every quarter of India. The scale of operations extended from Delhi, and the presidencies of Fort William, Fort St. George, and Bombay, to Poohnah, Hyderabad, Guzerat, and Orissa. The objects, to the accomplishment of which our operations were directed in the war with Dowlut Rao Scindiah, were the occupation of the sea port of Baroach, and of the territory annexed to it, and the general reduction of his military power and resources. In the prosecution of hostilities with the Rajah of Berar, the views of the Governor-General were chiefly directed to the occupation of the province of Cuttack, and the cession of all the Rajah's possessions intermixed with those of the Soubahdar of the Deccan; and the general reduction of his influence within the bounds requisite for the safety of the British possessions and those of their allies. In attacking Monsieur Perron, the entire reduction of his regular corps was contemplated, and, as a necessary consequence, the annexation to the British dominions of the whole of the territory in his possession within the Doab of the Jumna and Ganges, with a view to render the river Jumna the north-western frontier of the Company's dominion in that quarter. The army may be comprehended under two general divisions: that under Major-General Wellesley was directed to act against the combined forces of Scindiah and the Rajah of Berar; and the operations on the north-western frontier of Oude, were under the immediate direction of General Lake, Commander-in-chief. This force, amounting to about 55,000 men, was opposed to upwards of 100,000 native troops, including at least 50,000 cavalry, and commanded principally by French officers. On the 8th of August, hostilities commenced in the Deccan; and on that day Major-General Wellesley commenced his march towards the fortress of Ahmednuggur, the fortified town of which was carried by escalade, with great spirit and gallantry. On the 10th batteries were opened against the fortress of Ahmednuggur, which held out only two days, and the surrender of which placed the dependent districts under British authority. On the 24th of August, the confederate chiefs entered the Nizam's territory, by the Ghaut of Adjuntee, with a large body of horse, where they formed a junction with a detachment of irregular infantry, under the command of M. Pohlman and M. Dupont, consisting of sixteen battalions, with a formidable and well equipped train of artillery. The whole of this army was assembled in the neighbourhood of Bokerdun, and between that place and Jaffierabad. The two corps under the command of General Wellesley and Colonel Stevenson, formed a junction on the 21st of September, at Budnapoor, and immediately determined to attack the enemy on the morning of the 24th. Having come within sight of the enemy, whom the General found encamped in the neighbourhood of the fortified village of Assye, General Wellesley formed the infantry in two lines, with the British cavalry as a reserve in a third, in an open space between the Kaitna and the Juah rivers, which run nearly in a parallel direction; the Peishwah and the Mysore cavalry occupying a position to the southward of the Kaitna, in order to keep in check a large body of the enemy's cavalry. The number of the British troops engaged, amounted to about 4,500 men, of whom 1,200 were cavalry, European and native, 1,300 European infantry and artillery, and 2,000 Sepoys. The force of the enemy, which was composed of sixteen regular battalions of infantry, amounted to 10,500 men, commanded by European officers, and furnished with a train of artillery, exceeding 100 guns. In addition to this decided superiority of numbers, the enemy had some considerable bodies of horse in reserve, amounting, as it is stated, to 30,000 men. The British troops advanced under a severe and destructive fire from the enemy's cannon. The artillery producing little effect, and many difficulties opposing its advance, the General ordered it to be left behind, and the whole line to move on, directing Lieutenant-Colonel Maxwell, with the cavalry, to protect the right of the infantry as the line advanced. Notwithstanding a tremendous cannonade kept up by the enemy, they were obliged to fall back upon their second line in front of Juah. The enemy at length gave way in every direction, and the cavalry, having crossed the Juah, charged the fugitives along the bank of the river and completed the rout. The British cavalry afterwards re-crossed the Juah, to charge a body of infantry, which had retired, but was again formed, and in this charge the gallant Colonel Maxwell was killed. The victory was then decided, and the enemy retreated, leaving 1,200 men dead on the field of battle, which was covered with their wounded. Ninety-eight pieces of cannon, seven standards, the camp equipage of the enemy, a great number of bullocks and camels, and a large quantity of military stores and ammunition, were the fruits of this splendid victory, which, however, cost the conquerors one third of their army, including 1,130 wounded, and 428 slain. The complete defeat of the combined army of Scindiah and the Rajah of Berar, an irreparable blow to the strength and efficiency of their military resources, and the expulsion of a hostile and predatory army from the territory of the Soubahdar of the Deccan, formed the advantages resulting from the triumph of the British arms in the battle of Assye.

Colonel Stevenson was ordered to continue his route to Boorhanpoor, and about the middle of October, this city and the hill fort of Asseerghur, which is denominated the Key of the Deccan, surrendered to the British arms. In conformity to the comprehensive plan of operations

In the month of February this year, a plot was detected in France, the object of which seems to have been the overthrow of the existing government. The principal persons implicated in this conspiracy were General Pichegru, Georges Cadoudal, formerly a leader of the insurgents in Britanny, and Lajollais, a confidant of General Pichegru. It also appeared that General Moreau had, to a certain extent, been made acquainted with the views of Pichegru, and that he had held secret interviews with that General since his return from England to Paris. The first intimation of this intrigue was given by a confidential agent of the conspirators, operations formed by the Governor-General, which was calculated to attack at the same time the most distant possessions of Scindiah and of the Rajah of Berar, Lieutenant-Colonel Woodington attacked and carried the fort of Baroach by storm, by which achievement, the Company obtained possession of the district of that name, yielding an annual revenue estimated at eleven lacks of rupees. The remaining territory belonging to Scindiah, in the province of Guzerat, was the district of Champaneer, and on the 17th of September, the fort and town of that district were in the possession of the British troops. The invasion of the province of Cuttack was undertaken by Lieutenant-Colonel Harcourt, of his Majesty's 12th regiment of foot, who, on the 11th of September, arrived at Ganjam, and took the command of the troops at that station. On the 14th they made a movement in advance, and took possession of Manickpatam without resistance. Influenced by a letter from Colonel Harcourt, the Bramins of the Pagoda of Jagarnaut sent a deputation to the British camp at Manickpatam, to claim the promised protection of the British government. Colonel Harcourt accordingly proceeded to Jagarnaut, the Mecca of the Hindoos, and on the 18th encamped in the neighbourhood of this metropolis of idolatry, the Pagoda having been previously evacuated by the Mahratta forces. After the surrender of Jagarnaut, the towns of Cuttack, Ballasore, and Soorong, fell successively into the hands of the British troops, without resistance. Barabutty, the only remaining fort in the province of Cuttack, was stormed and carried by the troops under Colonel Harcourt, on the 13th of October.

On the 29th of August General Lake moved into the Mahratta territory, with the intention of attacking the force under M. Perron, which occupied an advantageous position at a short distance from the fortress of Ally Ghur. M. Perron immediately retired, and quitted the field without venturing to risk an engagement. The army having taken possession of Coel without resistance, General Lake encamped before Ally Ghur on the 4th of September, and determined, after an unsuccessful negociation with M. Pedron, the Commander of the garrison, to carry the fort by assault. The command of the storming party was confided to Lieutenant-Colonel Monson, who, after encountering a vigorous resistance, accomplished the object of his enterprise. About 2,000 of the enemy were killed on this occasion; numbers were drowned in attempts to escape, and those who surrendered were afterwards permitted to quit the fort. The French commandant, the only European in the place, was taken prisoner. The loss of the British, though bearing no proportion to that of the enemy, was extremely severe, and consisted of 43 killed, and 180 wounded, amongst the latter of whom were Lieutenants-Colonel Monson and Browne, Major Macleod, and several other officers. In the fort some tumbrils of money were found, which the storming party divided on the spot.

Ally Ghur was the residence of M. Perron, and the grand depot of his military stores, the greater part of which was, by the acquisition of this fortress, placed in the hands of the British Commander. The day after the successful assault of this fortress, M. Perron addressed a letter to General Lake, informing him that he had resigned the service of Scindiah, and requested permission to pass, escorted either by British troops or his own body-guard, with his family, property, and the officers of his suite, to Lucknow, through the territory of the Company, and of the Nawaub Vizier. General Lake complied with his request, and allowed him to pass with his body guard, with every mark of honour and respect. The only check which the British troops appear hitherto to have experienced was at Shekoabad. Repeatedly attacked by a superior force, under the command of a French officer, of the name of Fleury, Colonel Coningham was compelled to surrender; on the advantageous condition, however, that the garrison, which consisted of five companies of Sepoys, should be permitted to march to Cawnpore.

General Lake reached Secundra on the 9th of September, and on the 11th arrived at Jehnah Nullah, about six miles from Delhi, at eleven o'clock in the morning. The commander-in-chief having received intelligence that M. Louis Bourquien had crossed the Jumna in the night, with sixteen battalions of regular infantry, six thousand cavalry, and a considerable train of ordnance, for the purpose of attacking the British forces, immediately upon his arrival at Jehnah Fulluh, proceeded in person to reconnoitre them with the whole of his cavalry, consisting only of three regiments, and found them drawn up on a rising ground in order of battle, and in full force. Their position was strengthened by a swamp covering each flank, beyond which the cavalry was posted; their front being covered by a numerous artillery, and protected by a line of intrenchments. Unintimidated, either by the superiority of the enemy's numbers or the advantages of his position, General Lake ordered the line to fall in without delay, and to move to the front in columns of grand divisions. The troops engaged in this glorious action, were his Majesty's 76th regiment, seven battalions of Sepoys, the artillery, the 27th dragoons, and two regiments of native cavalry. The enemy's forces consisted of 13,000 infantry, and 600 cavalry; the British force, both cavalry and infantry, of only 4,500 men. The position of the enemy was such as to render it difficult to attack them with effect. General Lake determined therefore to make a feint retreat, that they might be induced to leave their intrenchments, and to advance upon the plain. This manœuvre produced the desired effect. The enemy immediately quitted their strong position, and advanced with the whole of their numerous artillery, shouting and exhibiting the strongest demonstrations of confidence in victory. The British infantry instantly formed into one line, with the cavalry about forty yards in the rear. The whole then proceeded against the enemy. The enemy kept up a tremendous fire of round, chain, and grape shot; but, notwithstanding the destruction it produced, the troops advanced with the greatest bravery and steadiness, without taking their muskets from their shoulders. When they approached within a hundred paces of the enemy, they were exposed to a heavy fire of grape from all their artillery. Orders were then given to charge the enemy with the bayonet; the whole line, with General Lake at their head, after firing a volley, rushed on with irresistible impetuosity, and the enemy giving way, fled in every direction. When the line halted, it was ordered to break into columns of companies. This manœuvre enabled the British cavalry to pass through the intervals, and to charge the enemy with their galloper guns, and pursuing them to the banks of the Jumna, they drove vast numbers into the river, and completed the victory: 68 pieces of ordnance, and 37 tumbrils, laden with ammunition, fell into the possession of the British army. Twenty-four other tumbrils exploded during the battle, and many others, with a number of ammunition carriages, were left by the enemy in the Jumna and the Jehnah Nullah. Two tumbrils containing treasure were taken on the field of battle. The loss of the enemy was estimated at 3,000 men. That of the British force was also very considerable, amounting, in killed, and wounded, and missing, to 485 men—about one ninth of the army brought into the field on this ever memorable occasion. Major Middleton, Cornet Sanguine, and several other European soldiers, fell under the scorching influence of the sun. The evacuation of the city and forts of Delhi, the dispersion of the enemy in all directions, and the increased reputation of the British arms, were amongst the important consequences of this achievment.

Immediately after, the unfortunate Emperor Shah Aulum sent to General Lake, expressing his desire to place his royal person and authority under the protection of his victorious arms. On the 16th of September, General Lake waited on his Majesty, and congratulated him on his emancipation from the oppressive and degrading controul of a French faction. The eldest son of his Majesty, Mirza Akbar Shah, conducted the Commander-in-chief to his royal presence. The crowd in the street was so great that it was with some difficulty the cavalcade could proceed to the palace, but General Lake was at length ushered into the presence of the unfortunate and venerable Emperor. Oppressed by the accumulated calamities of old age, degraded authority, poverty, and the loss of sight, this unhappy prince was seated under a tattered canopy, with every external appearance of misery and destitution. The impression which General Lake's conduct at this affecting and interesting interview, produced on the minds of the inhabitants of Delhi, is not to be described. In the metaphorical language of Asia, the extraordinary joy excited by the deliverance from bondage of the aged and infirm Shah Aulum, is represented to have restored his Majesty's sight! In addition to many distinguished marks of royal favour, the Emperor conferred on the General the second title in the empire; signifying "The sword of the state, the hero of the land, the lord of age, and the victorious in war." On the 24th of September General Lake moved from the city of Delhi, and on the 4th of October arrived before the fortress of Agra. The Commander-in-chief immediately summoned the garrison to surrender, but having received no answer he determined to attack the fort. In conformity with this determination, Colonel Clarke was directed, on the 10th of October, to take possession of the town with his brigade of Sepoys, while Lieutenant Macculloch, with three battalions of native troops, advanced to the attack of the ravines.

After a long and severe contest, the enemy evacuated the town. The attack on the ravines was equally successful; but the high spirit and bravery of the officers and men of the native battalions exposed them in some degree unnecessarily to considerable loss. On this occasion, twenty-six guns, with several tumbrils, were taken; and about 2,500 men surrendered to General Lake, and marched into the British camp on the 13th of October. On the same evening the garrison of the fort sent proposals to capitulate; and for the purpose of finally adjusting the terms of the capitulation, a British officer was sent into the fort; but while he was actually engaged in the negociation, the enemy treacherously re-commenced their fire, and the officer returned. In consequence of this act of perfidy, the breaching batteries were opened on the 17th, and the same evening, the garrison, consisting of about 5,000 men, capitulated. In the fortress of Agra were found a large quantity of stores, many guns, and several tumbrils, containing about twenty-four lacks of rupees.

Early in the campaign Scindiah had detached from the Deccan a considerable force under the command of M. Dudernaigne, for the purpose of reinforcing the army of M. Perron. This force, which was furnished with a numerous artillery, was destined to attempt the recovery of the important post of Delhi. To frustrate this design, Major-General Lake marched from Agra on the 27th of October in pursuit of the enemy, and on the 31st encamped a short distance from the ground which they had quitted the same day. At 12 o'clock the same night General Lake marched with the cavalry, and came up with the enemy about seven o'clock in the morning of the 1st of November. The enemy's force, which was posted with the right in front of the village of Laswaree, and the left upon the village of Mohauloor, consisted of 9,000 infantry, upwards of 4,000 cavalry, and 72 pieces of artillery. Although the British infantry had not arrived, the original plan of attack, which had for its object to prevent the re-conspirators, who had been arrested near Calais, and on his information, Lajollais, Moreau, and several others, were placed under arrest. This treason against the consular government was announced to the public in a report to the first consul prepared by Regnier, the minister of justice, and which ascribed the whole plot to England and her emissaries. On the promulgation of this report, the genius of the French nation displayed itself in a profusion of legislative provisions, and in copious and abject addresses.

Pichegru, it appeared, had hired of one Le Blanc, a broker, a small apartment at an enormous price, relying on the fidelity and attachment of his host for his security. But his confidence was misplaced; for this unprincipled wretch, having obtained from Murat, the governor of Paris, and brother-in-law of Buonaparte, a promise of 100,000 livres, introduced six gens d'armes into the General's apartment on the night of the 27th of February, while he was asleep, and secured his pistols and dagger, which were laid upon a table near his bed. Awakened by the noise, the General sprang on to the floor naked and unarmed, and it was not till he was exhausted by fatigue and loss of blood that he surrendered, and was conveyed to prison. The following day, the legislature passed a law, that any person concealing Georges, or any of the individuals who were named as associates in his plot, should be considered as principals in guilt, and should expiate their offence with their life. For some days Georges had the good fortune to escape the vigilance of the police, but on the 10th of March, he was discovered in a chaise with his friend Leridan the younger, and after a desperate resistance, in which he shot the police officer by whom he was stopped dead upon the spot, and wounded another of the officers of justice, he was secured and conveyed to prison. Immediately on the arrest of General Pichegru, he underwent an examination before the prefect of the police, the object of which was to obtain from him a confession, that he returned to France under the direction of the French Princes, and that his intention was to replace the Bourbons on the throne of their ancestors. After a second examination he was committed to the tower of the Temple, where he remained for about a month, when on a sudden the government announced, that he had terminated his existence by suicide.*

The trial of the other parties implicated in this plot, took place in Paris in the month of July, before the criminal tribunal of the department of the Seine, when Georges, and nineteen others, were convicted, and condemned to suffer death, with confiscation of property. General Moreau was sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

treat of the enemy, and to secure their guns, was immediately carried into execution. Major Griffiths, Colonel Vandeleur, and Colonel Macan, with their respective brigades, charged the enemy with great gallantry and spirit, forced their line, and took several of the guns. The enemy's fire was however found so galling and destructive, that the British cavalry, after maintaining their ground with distinguished heroism for some time, were at length obliged to retire, leaving Colonel Vandeleur, and several of their gallant comrades, dead upon the field. At noon, the infantry, who had that morning performed a march of 25 miles, arrived on the banks of the rivulet, where the cavalry were assembled. In about an hour the British infantry advanced to the attack, and as soon as they became exposed to the enemy's artillery, opened their batteries and commenced their fire. The enemy, whose artillery was decidedly superior to that of the British, both in number and weight of metal, discharged grape shot from large mortars, as well as from guns of a very heavy calibre. The 76th regiment, which headed the attack, suffered so much from the fire of the enemy, that General Lake judged it preferable to proceed to the attack with that regiment, and a small body of native infantry which had closed to the front, rather than wait for the remainder of the column. As soon as this small band of heroes had arrived within reach of the enemy's guns, a most tremendous fire of canister-shot was opened upon them. The loss sustained by the British troops was so severe, that the enemy were encouraged to attempt a charge; but they were repulsed with loss, and obliged in their turn to retreat. Their cavalry, however, immediately rallied, and their posture became so menacing, that General Lake deemed it necessary to order the cavalry to advance and to charge them. At this instant Major Griffiths fell, by a cannon shot; but Captain Wade, by whom his station was immediately supplied, achieved this service with the most distinguished gallantry and success. The remainder of the first column of British infantry having arrived in time to join in the attack on the enemy's reserve, Major-General Ware was proceeding to execute this service, but was killed by a cannon shot. To the last moment of the battle the enemy opposed a vigorous resistance, nor did they abandon their ground until all their artillery was lost. Their left even then attempted to retreat in good order, but this movement was entirely frustrated by Lieutenant-Colonel John Vandeleur, who broke in upon their column and completed the victory. The zeal which the British army displayed on this memorable day was too plainly proved by the returns of the killed and wounded. The numbers amounted to 822, including many meritorious and sincerely lamented officers. Of the enemy, 2,000 were taken prisoners, and the greater part of the remainder slain. In addition to this irreparable loss, the whole of the bazars, camp equipage, and baggage, fell into the hands of the British troops; with a considerable number of elephants, camels, and upwards of 700 bullocks; 72 pieces of cannon of different calibres; 44 stands of colours, and 64 tumbrils completely laden with ammunition. Three tumbrils with money were also captured, together with 57 carts laden with match-locks, muskets, and stores. During the action several tumbrils with ammunition exploded; and 5,000 stand of arms thrown down by the enemy were found on the field. In the midst of the slaughter, General Lake had two horses killed under him; but while the shot poured round him in every direction, he displayed the most resolute fortitude, and the most ardent valour.

Thus terminated the short but brilliant campaign of the east; and treaties of peace and alliance were, in conformity to instructions from the Governor-General, concluded with the following chieftains of Hindostan. The Rajahs of Berar, Bhurratpore, Macherry, Jeynagur, and the Rajah Umbajee Rao Englah. Two separate treaties were concluded with Dowlut Rao Scindiah; a partition treaty with the Peishwa, and with the Soubahdah of the Deccan; and a treaty was also concluded with the Rajah of Gohud. The inhabitants of Calcutta voted that a marble statue of the Governor-General should be erected, as a lasting memorial of his eminent public services; and it was at the same time agreed to present swords of considerable value to Generals Lake and Wellesley. At home, the thanks of Parliament were voted to his excellency, and to the commanders, officers, and soldiers of the several armies which had shared in the dangers and in the glories of the contest; while his Majesty, to express the royal approbation of the signal services conferred upon the country by the Generals of the east, was pleased to create General Lake a Peer of the realm, and to confer upon General Wellesley the honour of the noble order of the Bath.

* The account given of this event by the government was, that the General went to bed about midnight on the 6th of April, and that when the boy who waited upon him had retired, he drew from beneath his bolster, where he had secreted it, a black silk cravat, which he wound round his throat, and introducing into the two ends of the cravat a piece of stick, which he had also secreted, he twisted it about until strangulation was produced; and to prevent the stick from returning, he placed one end of it behind his left ear, and then placing the left side of his head upon his pillow, expired in that situation. At seven o'clock in the morning, the turnkey entered his room to light his fire, but seeing the prisoner a corpse, with his face discoloured, his jaw locked, and his tongue pressed between his teeth, he immediately gave the alarm. No sooner had the fact of the death of General Pichegru come to the knowledge of the criminal tribunal than they dispatched eight physicians and surgeons to inspect the body, and their report, agreeing in substance with the above representation, was publicly read in the tribunal of the section, by the officer of health. But with whatever art and care these proceedings were drawn up, the account they contained was by no means satisfactory. The formation of an artificial tourniquet, by means of a piece of faggot stick, and the persevering use of it, as described in the report, were considered as improbable and unnatural. The description of the deceased General taking his handkerchief from under his bolster, at a time when no eye could see him, was deemed an absurd invention; and the moral and religious character of the man was considered a strong presumptive proof that he had not committed the crime imputed to him. It was on the contrary said, that while General Pichegru was in prison, attempts were made to extort from him confessions by the application of the torture, but that his unconquerable firmness rendered these barbarities unavailing, and that, in order to conceal the marks of the torture, and to avoid the exposure which must have taken place on his trial, recourse was had to the last expedient of a despotic government, and the victim of private assassination was calumniated as a suicide.(a) imprisonment. To Armand Polignac, M. de Rivière Lajollais, and M. de Lozier, who were in the number of the convicted, a pardon was extended. On the 25th of July, Georges and eleven others were guillotined at the Place de Greve. They died with the most heroic firmness, and were accompanied to their graves by the regrets of thousands. After some delay, General Moreau was permitted to embark for North America.*

(a) Soon after the death of General Pichegru, died, in the same prison of the Temple, a British naval officer, whose fate was deeply deplored, and the circumstances of which gave rise to the suspicion that his death proceeded from the hands of violence rather than from the ordination of Providence. On the 15th of May, accident threw into the hands of the enemy Captain Wright, who, while cruising on board a corvette, in the Bay of Quiberon, was becalmed and made prisoner by the French gun-boats. He was a person in whose capture Buonaparte would for every reason rejoice. He had been the fellow-prisoner of Sir Sidney Smith, and after escaping with that officer from the Temple, had served with him in Egypt and Syria, and had already been named in the reports as the person who effected the landing of Georges, Pichegru, and their companions, on the coast of France. Captain Wright, on his arrival in Paris, was immured in the Temple, where he resisted every temptation that was held out to allure him to make disclosures to the injury of his country, and where he fell the victim, as is supposed, of his virtue, honour, and constancy. Since the restoration of Louis XVIII. various documents have been discovered, in the archives of the police, and given up to Captain Wright's family, all tending to corroborate this belief.

As Buonaparte appeared nearer to the authority and dignity of a sovereign, he seemed resolved, if possible, to annihilate the relics of that unhappy race, which had, for so many centuries, given monarchs to France. The Duke D'Enghien, the worthy representative of the House of Condé, had, since the continental peace, lived in retirement, at the town of Ettenheim, in the Electorate of Baden. In this neutral territory, Buonaparte resolved to seize him; for which purpose he sent General Caulincourt, his Aid-de-Camp, with a body of cavalry, who entered the Electorate, without ceremony, on the 15th of March, and, coming unawares upon the destined victim, secured the Duke, and several of his friends, without difficulty, and even without opposition. The Duke was immediately conveyed to Strasburgh, and thence, without delay, and without any interval of repose, to Paris; where he was conducted to the same prison, the Temple, which had been the last scene of his sovereign's miseries. He was not, however, permitted to remain here, or to take the smallest rest, but was hurried away to the castle of Vincennes, where he arrived on the 20th of March; and that same evening, exhausted with fatigue, he was dragged before his judges. A mock trial ensued, and the illustrious prisoner was found guilty of having borne arms against the French republic, to which he owed no allegiance, and of having conspired to restore the French monarchy, to which he was bound by every tie that is obligatory on the human mind. In the night, Buonaparte's brother-in-law, Murat, with four other general officers, among whom were his own brother, Louis Buonaparte, and Duroc, the Consul's secretary, arrived at the castle, under an appropriate escort of Mamelucs. The murderous deed was performed by the Consul's body guards. The Duke died, as he had lived, with the spirit of a Christian soldier. He expressed his satisfaction that his assassins were not Frenchmen, (they were Italians) as his wretched country never would have one crime less to answer for.

The intelligence of the mock trial, and consequent murder of this unfortunate Prince was first made known in papers printed out of France; for it was not until several days after the event, that the Paris newspapers contained any narrative on the subject. In private, where men could venture to express an opinion, every one declared his abhorrence of the act, and every Frenchman sought to alleviate his portion of the burthen of national infamy, by congratulating himself that he was not one of the Italians who had performed this task of midnight butchery. In foreign countries, where any free opinion could be avowed, the murder was stigmatized in becoming terms, and in some, solemn funeral obsequies were performed in honour of the victim. Several notes on the illegal seizure of the Duke d'Enghien, and the violation of the neutrality of the German empire, were delivered both to the diet of Ratisbon, and addressed to the French minister for foreign affairs. Among these by far the most spirited were the notes presented by the Russian, Swedish, and Hanoverian ministers.†

Buonaparte

* In an exculpatory letter written by Moreau to the first consul he acknowledged that distant overtures had been made to him, to enter into correspondence with the French Princes; but to those proposals, which appeared to him to be ridiculous, he returned, as he affirms, no answer. The part of giving information to government was repugnant to his character; such an office, he adds, is always judged of severely; but it becomes odious, and is marked with the seal of reprobation against the individual who exercises it to the injury of those persons to whom his gratitude is due, and with whom he has long cultivated habits of friendship. Duty, he observed, may sometimes yield to public opinion.

† The murder of the Duke d'Enghien, had scarcely been accomplished, when another conspiracy was announced by the grand judge of the French courts. In his report to the first consul it is stated, that the British minister resident at the court of Munich, had engaged in a clandestine correspondence with certain individuals in the heart of France, with a view to overturn the government of that country. That these agents had been supplied with large sums of money by the British government, which were to be employed by establishing an intelligence in the different public offices of France; in gaining over those employed in the powder mills of that country, in procuring a correct knowledge of the different parties in France; and in taking every means to disorganize the armies. Such is the substance of the instructions cited by the grand judge, as given by Mr. Drake to his principal correspondent, Mehée de Latouche, who was supposed to be at the head of a committee of mal-contents assembled at Paris, and these facts were supported by a variety of documents and intercepted letters annexed to the report. This M. Mehée was, it appears, a man of notoriously infamous character—an intriguer by profession, who had insinuated himself into the confidence of some of the members of the British government, and through their introduction had gained access to Mr. Drake, to whom he had made a tender of his services. But the proposal from Mehée was a snare, to discover the views and the private means of procuring information adopted by the English cabinet; for the supposed conspirator was, from the beginning of his intrigue, actually in the confidence of the French government. The principal object of the report promulgated by Regnier, the grand judge, was to implicate Mr. Drake in a participation in the plans of Georges and his adherents, and the conduct pursued on this occasion by the Elector of Bavaria, shews that he was not altogether unsuccessful in establishing his position. Copies of the report, and the documents, were addressed to the several ministers from the foreign courts resident at Paris, and these papers were accompanied by a circular from M. Talleyrand, denouncing Mr. Drake as a participator in the infamous plot at that time before the French tribunals. The answers to this communication were for the most part conveyed in general terms of compliment to the first consul, but some of the representatives of foreign states condemned the conduct of the British envoy, in terms of the severest reprehension, and of this number the Danish minister, M. Dreyer, and the American minister, Mr. Livingston, were the most conspicuous. The original documents upon which the charge against the British minister was founded, were transmitted to Munich, and on the 31st of March, a note was addressed to Mr. Drake, by the Baron de Montgelas, prime minister to the Elector of Bavaria, expressive of the regret of his serene highness, that his capital should have been the central point of a correspondence so inconsistent with the mission with which Mr. Drake was invested; and intimating, that it was due to his own dignity, and to the welfare of his subjects, to declare, that from the present moment it became impossible for him to hold any communication with Mr. Drake, or again to receive him at his court. After the receipt of this note, it was no longer in the power of Mr. Drake to prolong his residence in the Bavarian territories; and Mr. Spencer Smith, the British envoy to the Elector of Wurtemburg, who was stated to have been implicated in these transactions, was also under the necessity of quitting Stutgard. The impression made by these transactions in every court of Europe, rendered it necessary that some notice should be taken of them by the British government. Accordingly, a circular letter was addressed by Lord Hawkesbury to each of the foreign ministers resident at the court of London, in which the secretary for foreign affairs repels the charge preferred against his Majesty's government, of participating in any project of assassination; but his Lordship at the same time maintains, that if any minister, accredited to a foreign court, had held correspondence with persons in France, with a view of obtaining information of the projects of the French government, or for any other legitimate purpose, he had done no more than ministers, under similar circumstances, had been uniformly considered as having a right to do, with respect to the countries with which their sovereign was at war. This position of Lord Hawkesbury was commented upon some time after in a circular note from M. Talleyrand; in which the French minister asserts, that diplomatic agents had at all times been considered as ministers of peace—organs of conciliation—but the British government wished to make them the instigators of plots, the agents of troubles, the directors of machinations; vile spies; cowardly seducers; the fomentors of seditions; the paymasters of assassins. And the French ministers to whom these notes were directed, were ordered to declare to the governments where they resided, that Buonaparte would not recognize the English diplomatic body in Europe, so long as the British government did not abstain from charging its ministers with any warlike agency, and did not restrain them within the limits of their function. However, shortly after the appearance of the circular note of M. Talleyrand, in which the French government attempted to place the British diplomatic corps out of the protection of the law of nations, upon the ground of their violating this general inter-national code, that government committed a most daring infraction of the very law which they had just expressed so much solicitude to uphold. On the night of the 24th of October, a body of two hundred and fifty French troops, under the command of a general officer, embarked at Harburgh, and landed between Hamburgh and Altona, at a place called the Hamburgh-hill. They proceeded to Gridelhof, where Sir George Rumbold, the British minister to the Hanseatic towns, and the circle of Lower Saxony, had his country residence. Those who first approached the house affected to be couriers with dispatches from Tonningen; but entertaining suspicion, Sir George refused them admittance. Upon this the whole body rushed forward, broke open the doors, seized Sir George and his papers, and conveyed him to a carriage, which was waiting for the purpose of conducting him to Hanover, whence he was sent off to Paris. The following morning, as soon as the senate of Hamburgh heard of this violation of their territorial

Buonaparte having failed in his attempt to induce the rightful sovereign of France, Louis XVIII. to relinquish his pretensions to the crown, is charged with having made an effort to take him off by poison.* In that also, he failed. However, encouraged by the general state of things, he proceeded to ascend the last step on the ladder of ambition. When all the previous preparations had been made, addresses were presented to him, by the legislative and municipal bodies, and by the different armies, in the months of March, April, and May, beseeching him to become Emperor of the French. No extreme of baseness, in adulation, which the human mind can conceive, could exceed that by which these addresses were marked. A man stained with every crime, and whose hands were still running with the blood of an innocent and a virtuous Prince, was, with the most astonishing contempt of decency and truth, held up as a model of virtue. The slaves whom he ruled with a rod of iron, who trembled at his nod, and who held him in execration, were represented as happy under his mild and free government, and as ardently desirous to perpetuate his reign. When the public had thus been apprized of the Consul's intentions, a decree was finally passed, by the Senate, on the 18th of May, which abolished the constitution which the Senators and Consuls themselves had so recently sworn to observe and maintain inviolate, declared Napoleon Buonaparte Emperor of the French, and the imperial dignity hereditary in the family of this foreign adventurer. The new Emperor then addressed a letter to his Bishops, in which he ascribed his elevation to Providence, and ordered a Te Deum to be sung, in all the churches, on the glorious occasion. The Bishops kept pace in their adulation, with the military and civil bodies, and framed new prayers adapted to the new order of things;—while, to crown the whole, and to render, as it were, religion herself the handmaid to usurpation, the Pope was ordered to attend the ceremony of the coronation, and, with his own hands, to place the crown on the sacrilegious head of the usurper. This ceremony, which put the seal to the degradation of France, took place on the 19th of November, in the Cathedral of Notre Dame, at Paris, the same church in which, with more zeal, the Parisians had, a few years before, worshipped a naked prostitute, as the goddess of reason, in obedience to the command of Buonaparte's friend and predecessor, Maximilian Robespierre. The aged Pontiff thus disgraced the character which he bore, and the religion which he professed, by administering "the holy unction" to an impious usurper, and by dignifying an impenitent murderer with the title of his "beloved son, in Jesus Christ."

Buonaparte's assumption of the imperial dignity gave a new interest to the political concerns of Europe; and the time had now arrived when the Germanic body was no longer to be considered as united under one head. In the month of August, the Emperor Francis issued a decree, by which his title of Emperor of Germany was changed for that of Emperor of Austria. The decree of the council of state declared the object of this measure to be, "the preservation of that degree of equality which should subsist between the great powers, and the just rank of the house and state of Austria among the nations of Europe." The Emperor further urged, that in conferring upon his family an hereditary imperial title, he was following the example of Russia in the last century, and of France in the present day. This event was hailed with undissembled joy by France and Prussia; and when it was announced to the Diet of Ratisbon, it excited no animadversion, except from the King of Sweden, who considered this change so inseparably connected with the composition of the German empire, that it was not to be laid before the diet merely as a notification, but as a subject for deliberation, in the discussion of which all the members of the diet might express their opinions as authorized by the constitution. No tribute could have been more flattering to Buonaparte than this concession, which not only made the sovereign, hitherto considered as the first in Europe, in point of dignity, more recent in the creation of title than himself, but even recorded the example of the French Emperor as one of the motives of the conduct of the Emperor Francis.

The renewal of war on the continent, had been some time confidently expected. On the 5th of May, the Emperor of Russia presented an energetic note to the diet of Ratisbon, on the seizure of the Duke d'Enghien; in which he declared, that he learned, with equal astonishment and concern, the event that had taken place at Ettenheim, the circumstances by which it was attended, and its melancholy result. And the concern of the Emperor, on this occasion, was the more lively, as he could, by no means, reconcile the violation of the territory of the German empire, to those principles of justice and propriety which are held sacred among nations, and are the bulwark of their reciprocal relations. To this remonstrance, the French minister replied, "that the Emperor of Germany, and the King of Prussia, who, undoubtedly, were the two powers most concerned in the fate of the German empire, had considered the French government sufficiently authorised to arrest, at two leagues distance from her frontiers, French rebels, who had conspired against their own country, and who, by the nature of their plots, as well as by the terrible evidence which corroborated them, had placed themselves out of the protection of the law of nations."—"The German Princes being thus satisfied, the First Consul felt himself in no way responsible to the Emperor of Russia, on a point which did not concern his interest; and if it were the intention of his Majesty to form a new coalition in Europe, and to recommence the war, what need was there of empty pretences, and why did he not act openly?" Two months elapsed before a ritorial rights, they assembled at seven o'clock, and continued sitting till five o'clock in the afternoon. As the result of their deliberations, they presented a remonstrance to the French minister, M. Reinhard, who denied having any knowledge whatever of the transaction. The order for the arrest, it seems, was transmitted from Paris directly to Marshal Bernadotte. Being thus foiled in their attempt to procure reparation, or even any explanation of the affair, from the French minister, the senate conceived it proper to apprise the courts of Berlin, Vienna, and Petersburgh, of this violation of their territory. An explanation of this act of violence was afterwards given to the senate of Hamburgh, by the French minister, Reinhard, who pretended to justify the seizure of Sir George Rumbold, upon the ground of his being concerned in the conspiracy imputed to Mr. Drake; but the fallacy of the pretext is sufficiently obvious, from the circumstance of Sir George Rumbold being no where alluded to in the correspondence with Mehée de Latouch. On his arrival at Paris, Sir George Rumbold was conveyed to the Temple, where he was treated with civility during a confinement of two days and two nights. On the third day he was removed from the Temple, and conducted towards the coast of the Channel, having first entered into a stipulation not to return to Hamburgh; nor, after his departure from France, to go within fifty miles of any part of the French territory. Before he left the Temple, he made an application for his papers, which had been transmitted to the minister of the police; but this demand was peremptorily refused. He was then put into a carriage with his servant, and conveyed to Boulogne, and afterwards to Cherbourg. The flag of truce in which he had embarked, falling in with his Majesty's frigate the Niobe, Sir George was taken on board, and landed at Portsmouth on the 17th of November. This act of violence was the subject of an official note from Lord Hawkesbury to the cabinet of Berlin; but that court had previously made a remonstrance on the subject to the French government, and to that remonstrance the release of Sir George Rumbold is chiefly to be ascribed.

* It is said, that two men became acquainted with one Coulon, a Frenchman by birth, who kept a billiard table at Warsaw. Having discovered that Coulon was intimate with several of the domestics of the French King, and in particular with the cook, and that he was in want of money, they gradually revealed to him their design against the life of the King, and offered him for his services four hundred Louis d'ors. In executing this plan, Coulon was to visit the cook, and after betraying him into a state of intoxication, he was to throw into the pot a small parcel, consisting of carrots filled with arsenic, with which he was to be provided. Coulon, although he affected to acquiesce in these diabolical suggestions, went immediately to the Baron de Milleville, usher to the Queen, and informed him of the plot. It was afterwards communicated to the Count Avaray, who thought proper to conceal it from his Majesty until he obtained more positive information. He waited on the President de Hoym without delay, who authorised him, in case the information was well founded, to cause the authors of the plot to be arrested by the King's domestics. By order of M. de Milleville, Coulon repaired to the place, where he was under an engagement to meet the agents of the plot, and returned with the poisoned carrots in his pocket. Coulon then made a declaration of what had passed, and the packets were placed in the possession of Count Avaray.

reply was made to this paper, but on the 21st of July, M. d'Oubril, the Russian charge d'affaires, complained, that it was, in all respects, evasive; and, by no means, an answer to the note he had delivered.* An important correspondence ensued, during which, the King of Sweden appeared to be animated with a courageous resolution to support the principles of the laws of nations, and to make common cause with the Emperor Alexander.†

During the Parliamentary recess, Mr. Pitt was sedulously employed in cementing a good understanding, and in strengthening the connection which subsisted, between this country and the court of St. Petersburgh. And his success, in this instance, was so complete, that the foundation was laid for a new confederacy against France, as soon as a favourable opportunity should occur for carrying it into effect.—Mr. Pitt also found it expedient to renew his connection with Mr. Addington; and that gentleman having been called up to the House of Peers, by the title of Viscount Sidmouth, was, on the 14th of January, 1805, appointed to succeed the Duke of Portland, as Lord President of the Council. The day after this appointment, the session of Parliament was opened by his Majesty in person. The speech from the throne announced that the preparations for invasion were still carried on by France, with unremitting activity—that Spain, under the controul of the French government, had issued a declaration of war against this country—and that a communication, containing a profession of a pacific disposition, had recently been received from France, to which his Majesty had replied, by expressing his earnest desire for the restoration of the blessings of peace, not deeming it proper to enter into a more particular explanation without previously consulting those continental powers with whom he was engaged in confidential intercourse. The usual address, moved in the Peers, by the Hon. Henry Augustus Dillon, passed unanimously in both Houses.

On the 23d of January, 120,000 men, including marines, were voted by the House of Commons, for the service of the navy, for the year 1805, and a sum not exceeding 2,886,000*l.* for the payment of the men. At the same time, the sum of 2,964,000*l.* was granted for victualling, and 4,680,000*l.* for wear and tear of shipping, &c. The number of men, at this time, actually employed in the navy amounted to 108,000. On the 4th of February, the secretary at war moved the army estimates of the year, which amounted to 12,395,490*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* for 312,018 men, under the different heads of service.—Shortly afterwards, a bill was brought in, and passed, to continue the act of the last session, for the suspension of the habeas corpus act in Ireland.‡

The papers relating to the dispute with Spain, became the subject of a lengthened discussion, which continued for two days, the 11th and 12th of February. Mr. Pitt entered into a long and luminous explanation, and defence of the conduct of the British government; which was, however, severely reprobated by Mr. Grey; who considered the language and conduct of the cabinet, in the first instance, (during Mr. Addington's administration) as too tame, irresolute, and indecisive; and, at last, after Mr. Pitt came into power, as too precipitate, and too violent. He moved various resolutions conformable with these sentiments. A long discussion ensued, in which much learning was displayed, in explaining and applying the law of nations, as laid down by Vattel and others, and in which much special pleading was applied to the purpose of perverting the obvious meaning of the plainest passages referred to in support of opposite conclusions. Mr. Windham, Dr. Lawrence, Mr. Fox, and Lord Temple, joined in censuring the conduct of ministers, while it was ably defended by Lord Castlereagh, Sir John Nicholls, the Master of the Rolls, and again by Mr. Pitt himself, who made a masterly reply to all the arguments which had been advanced in support of Mr. Grey's amendment; which, on a division, was rejected by 313 votes against 106.

The next subject of importance, that engaged the attention of Parliament, arose out of a motion made, in the Peers, by the Earl of Darnley, and in the Commons, by Mr. Sheridan, for the repeal of the additional force bill, a measure which it was contended, had, in the course of the last eight months, raised no more than 1295 men, of whom 343 only had been applicable to general service. This motion, which produced very elaborate and spirited debates, was lost, in the Lords, by a majority of 68 voices; and, in the Commons, by a majority of 140.

Amongst the measures for the reformation of the public expenditure, meditated or resolved upon by the Addingtonian administration, an inquiry into the abuses of the naval department was one of the most prominent. To give efficacy to these investigations, a bill was passed in 1803, appointing commissioners for that purpose, and empowering those commissioners to take examinations with a view to the discovery of abuses. This bill, in a great degree, originated with Earl St. Vincent, First Lord of the Admiralty—a situation which, upon Mr. Pitt's re-admission to power, Lord Melville was appointed to occupy. In the meanwhile, the commissioners had prosecuted their investigations, the result of which was the production of several successive reports; one of which appeared to implicate the new First Lord of the Admiralty, who had, while he filled the office of Treasurer of the Navy, retained in his hands large sums of the public money, contrary to the statute of the 25th of his present Majesty.—On the 8th of April, Mr. Whitbread brought the 10th report of the commissioners of Inquiry under the consideration of the House of Commons. The honourable gentleman began by complimenting the commissioners on their zeal and activity; they had done their duty to the public, and it fell to his lot, to bring to justice those whom they had exposed.* The report, he observed, involved a considerable number of individuals; not only Lord Melville and Mr. Trotter, his paymaster, but Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Mark Sprott, the stock-broker, made a considerable figure in the scene. "In exhibiting a charge against Lord Melville," observed Mr. Whitbread, "I do not accuse a mere unprotected individual: that nobleman has enjoyed, during the greater part of his life, an ample share of the public rewards and public honours. For a period of 30 years, he has been in the uninterrupted possession of some lucrative office, and has exercised a most extensive influence. He has many individuals attached to him by the consciousness of obligation; and, though not personally present, he has, no doubt, powerful friends in this House, who will be found ready to undertake his defence." He then referred to the act of 1785, of which Lord Melville (then Mr. Dundas) was the supporter, for regulating the department of Treasurer of the Navy, and to the order of Council, by which his salary was advanced from 2000*l.* to 4000*l.* a-year, in lieu of all profits, fees, or emoluments, which he might before have derived from the public money lying in his hands. "With respect to the period he was in office," said Mr. Whitbread, "I shall make three distinct charges: I charge Lord Melville with having applied the money of the public to other uses than those of the naval department, with which he was connected, in express contempt of an act of Parliament. I also charge him with conniving at a system of peculation in an individual, for whose conduct he was officially responsible; and for this connivance, I denounce him as guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour. There is yet a third charge, on which I shall not insist very largely at present, but which, if the inquiry I ask be instituted, I shall feel myself most powerfully called upon to support: I mean, Sir, the strong suspicion which arises from what has appeared before the commissioners, that the noble Lord himself, was a participator in that system of peculation. It is certainly to the honour of public men, that charges like this have seldom been preferred; and it is a singular circumstance, that the only instance of a similar charge, for a great number of years, was brought against Sir Thomas Rumbold, by the noble Lord himself, on the ground of malversations in India.—With respect to the first charge, it appears from the report of the committee, that there have been, for a number of years, deficiencies in the Treasurer of the Navy's department, to the amount of upwards of 600,000*l.* a year. When Lord Melville was asked a plain question, as to the appropriation of this money, what, if conscious of innocence, had he to do, but to return a plain and distinct answer? But the noble Lord, as well as his agent, Mr. Trotter, professed total ignorance of the deficiencies; but by and by, the paymaster begins to recover his recollection, and he then confesses, that from the year 1786, down to the period when he was examined, he had been in the habit of drawing out public money, and placing it in the hands of his own bankers. But when the commissioners inquire a little further, he tells them, that they have no right to ask him any more questions.—Lord Melville, in a letter to the commissioners, is a little more communicative; his Lordship acknowledges the fact of advances having been made to him; but he tells the commissioners, that he cannot give the other information required, because he cannot disclose state secrets, and because he is not in the possession of the papers containing the accounts of advances made to other departments, having, himself, committed them to the flames; and not only has the noble Lord destroyed the papers, but he has actually lost all recollection of the whole affair!†—My second charge against Lord Melville is, that he connived at the appropriation of public money to private purposes. Trotter does not deny that he had large sums in the hands of Mr. Coutts, his private banker; but he says, it was more convenient for the money to be there than in the Bank of England, and more secure: and for the truth of this opinion, he appeals to Lord Melville—to Lord Melville, who framed and sanctioned the bill of 1785!—to Lord Melville, who, not satisfied with the regulations of the act of 1785, proposes still stricter limitations in 1786! For what purpose, however, I would ask, was there so constant a fluctuation in Mr. Trotter's account at the bank of Mr. Coutt's? and why such perpetual drafts for money, in the name of Mr. Trotter? At the time that he is anxious for the safety of what is passing through his hands, is it always lodged at Mr. Coutts's, allowing that to be the place of fittest security? No, Sir, it was employed in discounting bills, in forming speculations, in gambling on the Stock Exchange. I am appalled at the reflection of no less than 34,000,000*l.* of the public property having passed through Lord Melville's paymaster's hands. Why, Sir, the report states explicitly, that upwards of 8,000,000*l.* had been in the hands of his private banker, and nearly 7,000,000*l.* more are allowed to have passed through the same channel. While Mr. Trotter is thus busy, what is become of Lord Melville and his responsibility? Had Mr. Trotter's speculations failed, it was not to him, but to Lord Melville, that the public had to look for redress. I cannot, then, but think, that this negligent criminality is deserving of the severest reprehension. While the people were struggling with the heaviest burthens ever laid upon them, Mr. Trotter, and his silent discreet broker, Mr. Mark Sprott, were placing their heads together to lay out the public money to the greatest advantage: and Lord Melville never interferes; never once inquires into this paymaster's proceedings. Mr. Sprott, when interrogated by the commissioners, declines to answer their questions, and says, 'I have had the opinion of Mr. Serjeant Shepherd, and other eminent lawyers, and they advise me to preserve a religious silence.' Lord Melville and Mr. Sprott are not quite uniform on this part of the business; Mr. Sprott says nothing; but Lord Melville acknowledges that he knew of the transactions, but not of the detail. If he knew

* In this reply, the dispositions and conduct of the Russian and French governments were exhibited in contrast. Russia, it was asserted, had, on every occasion, endeavoured to maintain peace, and to mediate between France and those nations with which she had disputes. The French government, on the contrary, thought itself competent to occupy neutral countries, and to deprive them of their commerce. His Majesty was thereby alarmed, not indeed on his own account, but he was alarmed for the security of the other states of Europe. After an enumeration of the aggressions practised by France, towards Denmark, Portugal, Switzerland, Holland, and the Italian states, the charge d'affaires concluded by saying, that he was ordered to declare, that he could not prolong his stay at Paris, unless the French government should order its troops to evacuate the kingdom of Naples, and engage to establish, without delay, some principle of concert with his Imperial Majesty, for regulating the basis upon which the affairs of Italy should be formally adjusted. In addition to which it was required, that France, in conformity with the 6th article of the convention entered into with Russia, on the 11th of October, 1801, should indemnify the King of Sardinia for the losses he had sustained; and in virtue of the obligation of a mutual guarantee and mediation, should promise immediately to evacuate and withdraw its troops from the north of Germany, and to enter into engagements to respect in the strictest manner the neutrality of the Germanic body.—M. Talleyrand answered this note by referring to an article in the treaty, cited by M. D'Oubril, by which the two contracting governments engaged not to suffer their respective subjects to maintain any correspondence, direct, or indirect, with the enemies of the two states. The promotion of French emigrants to places of honour and trust in Russia, and the behaviour of the Russian ambassador, M. Markoff, while at Paris, were cited as breaches of this article. France also demanded the execution of the 9th article of this treaty, by which Russia engaged to guarantee the independence of the Seven Islands; and of the 2d article, the evident application of which, it was said, should have been, that instead of manifesting such a partiality for England, and of becoming, perhaps, the first auxiliary of its ambition, Russia should have united with France, in order to consolidate a general peace, to establish a just balance in the four parts of the world, and to promote the liberty of the seas. M. d'Oubril, in reply to this note, recapitulated all his complaints, animadverted on the evasive manner in which they had been answered, and on the 28th of August demanded his passports.

† As Duke of Pomerania, he charged his envoy to enter his vote in the protocol of the diet, under the date of the 27th of July, by which he declared, that he could not learn without the greatest anxiety and alarm, the events which had taken place in the electorate of Baden, in the month of March last—events by which the territorial rights of the German empire were flagrantly violated, and its future security exposed to the greatest danger. This note excited the resentment of the French government, and called down upon Gustavus a severe attack in the official paper, the Moniteur. In this paragraph the young and gallant sovereign was charged with folly and inconsistency, and assured, that his insignificance alone secured him from the resentment of the French government, which was too wise to confound a loyal and brave nation, justly called the 'France of the north,' with the conduct of a young man led astray by false notions, and unenlightened by reflection. Fired with indignation, at this attack, the King of Sweden issued a decree on the 7th of September, prohibiting the introduction of French publications into his dominions, and on the same day transmitted a note to M. Gaillard, the French charge d'affaires at Stockholm, stating his resentment at what he termed the improper, the insolent, and the ridiculous observations which Monsieur Napoleon Buonaparte had allowed to be inserted in his Moniteur. In consequence of this heated discussion, he declared that all diplomatic intercourse of every kind, both private and public, should immediately cease between the French legation, at Stockholm, and his government; but he, nevertheless, allowed the subsisting relations of commerce to remain uninterrupted.

‡ The grounds assigned for the renewal of this measure were, the notoriety of disaffection still prevailing in Ireland, the preparations of the enemy, for the invasion of that country, the number of Irishmen associated with the forces destined for that purpose, and the existence of a committee of united Irishmen, then sitting in Paris, and corresponding with the disaffected in the sister kingdom.

* From the "Tenth Report of the Commissioners of Naval Inquiry, appointed by an act of the 43d year of his Majesty's reign," it appears that, during the treasurership of Lord Melville, "the money issued for naval services, was used, to a great amount, for purposes of private emolument; and, that the sums standing in the name of the Treasurer of the Navy, at the Bank of England, were for the most part, considerably less than his unappropriated balances.

† The following copy of a letter from Lord Melville to the Commissioners of Naval Inquiry, is curious and interesting:—

Wimbledon, June 30, 1804.

"Gentlemen,

"I have received your requisition of the date of the 26th instant. It is impossible for me to furnish you with the account you ask. It is more than four years since I left the office of Treasurer of the Navy, and at the period of doing so, having accounted for every sum impressed in my hands, I transferred the whole existing balance to the account of my successor. From that time, I never considered any one paper, or voucher, that remained on my hands, as of the smallest use to myself, or any other person, and consequently, being often in the practice, since I retired to Scotland, of employing, occasionally, some time in assorting my papers, and destroying those that were useless, I am satisfied there does not exist any one material by which I could make up such an account as you specify. But, independently of that circumstance, I think it right to remind you, that during a great part of the time I was Treasurer of the Navy, I held other very confidential situations in government, and was intimately connected with others. So situated, I did not decline giving occasional accommodation from the funds in the treasurer's hands to other services, not connected with my official situation as Treasurer of the Navy. If I had materials to make up such an account as you require, I could not do it without disclosing delicate and confidential transactions of government, which my duty to the public must have restrained me from revealing.

(Signed) "MELVILLE."

that his paymaster was speculating in the funds, he was, at least, bound to see what was the extent of these speculations. He ought to have felt that his responsibility was at stake, that the public money was put to hazard, and that it was time to put a stop to so serious an evil.—On the third part of the subject, (the suspicion of criminal participation) Mr. Whitbread said, "Lord Melville had found Mr. Trotter clerk to the navy pay-office; he made him his paymaster, and in a short time, makes him his agent. In this situation of agent, Lord Melville has pecuniary concerns with him to a considerable amount; and when his Lordship is examined, he is unable to tell the commissioners whether the advances made to him by Mr. Trotter, were from his own, or the public money. The truth was, Mr. Trotter had, originally, no fortune; he was a man of good family; but when Lord Melville first began to patronise him, his Lordship himself knew that he had no property but what was derived from his salary; it was absolute equivocation, then, to pretend that Lord Melville could be ignorant of the source whence Trotter was enabled to supply him with advances. What was the language of all the predecessors and successors of Lord Melville? When the paymaster of Mr. Barre was asked whether Mr. Barre had ever received any emolument of the application of the public money? he readily answered, No. Had Lord Bayning received any advantage? No. Had Lord Harrowby? No. Had Mr. Bragge? Had Mr. Tierney? No. Lord Melville alone shelters himself beneath the confidential communications of government. He can afford no intelligence, for his papers are destroyed. He has no recollection of what took place only a few years ago. His memory, naturally so strong, has now lost its retentive faculty. Mr. Trotter's answers too, respecting Lord Melville, were of the most damning nature. 'Did you receive any emolument from the use of the public money?' inquired the commissioners. 'I won't tell you;' was the reply. 'Did Lord Melville share in any such profits?' 'I won't tell you;' was again reiterated. Mr. Whitbread expressed his conviction, that he must that night have a majority in favour of the resolutions he meant to move. He called upon the country gentlemen, upon the officers of the army and navy, upon the great commercial men, upon all who were independent members of that House, to give him their support, and to arrest, by their vote of that night, a practice of the most dangerous and pernicious tendency. He concluded, by moving 13 resolutions, founded on the matter of his speech.

Mr. Pitt, after a long, and very able speech, in reply,* moved, "that a select committee be appointed to consider the 10th report of the Commissioners of Naval Inquiry, and the documents therewith connected, that they examine the same, and report their opinion thereon to the House." At the suggestion of Mr. Fox, Mr. Pitt consented, in the first instance, to move the previous question. Mr. Tierney said, that during the time he was Treasurer of the Navy, he felt no inconvenience, from a compliance with the act of Parliament, and held that the report of the commissioners should be taken as conclusive evidence against Lord Melville.—That noble Lord had, in his opinion, already enjoyed as fair a trial as the nature of the case would admit of, and no committee of that House could throw any more light upon the subject.

After a number of observations from the Attorney-General, Mr. Canning, the Master of the Rolls, and Lord Castlereagh, in favour of a select committee, and from Lord Henry Petty, Mr. Ponsonby, Mr. Fox, and Mr. Wilberforce, in support of the original motion, the House divided; when, the numbers being equal, (216 against 216) the speaker gave his casting vote against Mr. Pitt's amendment; when the original motion was put and carried.

On the 10th of April, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced to the House of Commons, that Lord Melville had tendered his resignation of the office of First Lord of the Admiralty, which resignation his Majesty had been graciously pleased to accept. Mr. Whitbread said, that had the issue of the debate on Monday been merely of a personal or party nature, he might have been satisfied with Lord Melville's removal from the responsibility, dignity, and emolument attached to the situation which he had resigned—the humiliation of the individual was complete indeed. But there was a duty still remaining to the public. Having done so much, having exerted so much independence, having deserved, and having received, the thanks deserved, in the general exultation of the country, ought not the House to take another step to complete their triumph? Ought not Lord Melville to be prevented from ever again polluting, with his presence, the councils of his Majesty? This he thought so necessary, that previously to any other proceeding, he should move, "That an address be submitted by the House to the throne, praying his Majesty to deprive the noble Lord of every civil office held during the pleasure of the

* After a number of preliminary observations, he remarked, that there was no allegation in the report, or even in the speech of the honourable gentleman, that any loss to the public had been sustained by the transactions now under the consideration of the House; there was no allegation that any defalcation, any mischief, any evil, whatever, had accrued to the nation. He complained, that the honourable gentleman had attempted to give a view of the case altogether erroneous, when he called upon the House to pass sentence, as upon a person already tried and convicted. He admitted, at the same time, that the subject was one of a grave and solemn nature, and that, though no loss or inconvenience could be alleged to have arisen from the transactions that had taken place, yet, if in a great money department, irregularities had been committed, it might be the duty of the House to set a mark upon such proceedings. But, whether in this case it might be fit so to do, must depend upon a consideration of all the circumstances, which at present were not before them in the report. Till these circumstances were investigated and ascertained, the House could not be in a situation to form a fair opinion of the matter, far less could it be justified in coming to any vote of censure.—"The first charge," said Mr. Pitt, "dwelt upon by the honourable gentleman, though not that on which he calls for an immediate resolution, is, that certain sums of money were applied to other than naval services. On this head I must say, the whole case is not before us. Will the House be contented to pass judgment on the naked unexplained fact? Will they refuse to inquire what were the circumstances under which this application took place? Can it be denied that such a fact may exist in a variety of shades; that it may have been wanton, or it may have been necessary; that it may have been small or great; that it may have been done upon a responsibility, by which the public was benefitted in a most important matter? Will the House then refuse to inquire into those circumstances? Will they refuse to ascertain in what light the affair deserves to be viewed.—As to the charge of Lord Melville's connivance, I do not say that conniving at the application of the public money for the purpose even of innocent profit to individuals, without actual loss to the state, is altogether to be justified. But our judgment should depend upon a complete knowledge of all the circumstances—upon inquiry into the mode of its employment, and the probable danger, and amount of the sum employed. The Commissioners of Naval Inquiry, however, do not say that the issues to the Treasurer or Paymaster of the Navy were greater than necessary, or that the money impressed in his hands, was not forthcoming whenever it was wanting. In fact, nothing could accelerate those issues so much as to increase the balance in the paymaster's hands at pleasure." Mr. Pitt then proceeded to point out several errors in the tenth report of the Commissioners, and argued therefrom that before the House came to any decision, the documents should be submitted to a more minute examination.—"With regard," said he, "to the charge of Lord Melville having participated in the profits derived from the employment of the public money, it is particularly necessary that a more detailed examination should take place, as this is a point which depends so much upon matters of account. I had expected, however, that after the solemn denial of Lord Melville, on this subject, no suspicion of that kind would have been any longer insisted upon. Lord Melville has most expressly disclaimed his having knowingly, or intentionally, derived any profit or advantage from Mr. Trotter's application of public money—and he only declined to answer positively, because from the blending of the accounts, the advances made by Mr. Trotter might have been public money. On the face of these accounts, 100,000*l.* is the whole amount of the advances to Lord Melville. It is known that of all the sums of 160,000,000*l.* which have passed through the hands of his Lordship, every farthing has been applied to the purposes for which it was issued, and has been regularly accounted for; and it will be found, that, of the 100,000*l.*, which, on the face of the account was paid to Lord Melville, many of the drafts were, in reality, payments for public services. If this can be made out, as I am informed it can, it will place this matter in a new light, and is of itself a conclusive argument for further inquiry. Upon the whole, as there are no materials before the House, on which they can form a fair judgment; as the parties accused have not had a fair trial, have not enjoyed the right of hearing the charges, and meeting them by evidence and explanation; as the conclusions passed in the House, are many of them drawn from accounts detailed and difficult to be unravelled, which a committee can alone state with clearness and precision; as the appointment of such a committee, while it interposes little or no delay, in the determination of this important subject, will enable the House to do justice at once to the country and the parties accused, I shall conclude with moving, &c."

the crown, and to dismiss him from the councils of the kingdom for ever.' "I ask," said Mr. Whitbread, "the right honourable gentleman opposite, (Mr. Pitt) whether he is prepared to give a pledge to this effect? I also ask, whether the vote of this House has been treated with due deference in another quarter; whether Mr. Trotter has been dismissed?" (Mr. Canning, in reply, answered, "Yes.") Mr. Canning did not think that the case of Lord Melville, which, at the most, amounted to no more than a bare suspicion, warranted the severity of the proceedings now proposed; and, after a very animated conversation, Mr. Whitbread agreed to withdraw his motion, in lieu of which he moved, "That the resolutions of the former night be laid before his Majesty; and that they be carried up by the whole House." This resolution being carried, the House waited upon his Majesty with a copy of the resolutions, on Thursday, the 11th of April, to which his Majesty was graciously pleased to answer, that he should, on all occasions, receive, with the greatest attention, any representations of his Commons; and he was fully sensible of the importance of the matter which was the subject of their resolutions.

On the 6th of May, Mr. Whitbread made his motion for the erasure of Lord Melville's name from the list of privy counsellors; when the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose, and said, "In consequence of the honourable gentleman's notice that his motion would be renewed, I have had occasion to ascertain the sentiments of respectable gentlemen on both sides of the House, and I see reason to believe, that the step desired by the honourable gentleman, is considered, generally, as expedient; I have, therefore, felt it my duty to advise his Majesty to erase the name of Lord Melville from the list of privy counsellors; to this advice his Majesty has acceded, and on the first day that a council is held for general purposes, the business will be finally executed. I am not ashamed to confess, that I have not given this advice without a bitter pang. I will not erase from my bosom, feelings of private friendship, but I cannot suffer these feelings to interfere with what I find to be the declared sense of a majority of this House." Mr. Whitbread then inquired, whether Lord Melville held any place of profit during the pleasure of the crown, and was answered, 'none but for life;' on which he withdrew his motion.

The Commissioners of Naval Inquiry had, in the progress of these discussions, been sedulously occupied in the researches arising out of the 10th report: and Mr. Whitbread, in consequence of the facts which had transpired in the progress of that inquiry, now declared himself justified in giving notice of an intention finally to move for an impeachment. This notice was met, on the part of Mr. Robert Dundas, son of Lord Melville, by a requisition that the noble Lord should be admitted and heard by the House, on the subject of the 10th report, previously to the motion for impeachment being put. Leave to appear having been obtained from both Houses, on the 11th of June, Lord Melville, escorted by the serjeant at arms, advanced within the bar of the House of Commons, where a chair was placed for his reception, on which, having reposed himself, he rose, and entered upon his defence;* which, having concluded, he withdrew.

Mr. Whitbread then said, the excuse offered by Lord Melville for not directly answering questions, in consequence of the mixed state of Mr. Trotter's accounts, was strange and incredible. He argued on the suspicious circumstance of refusing to give any account of the two sums of 10,000*l.; and declared he should be satisfied, if his Lordship would refer the matter to a jury of honour, consisting of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Windham, and any other person of equal integrity, in case they acquitted him. Mr. Whitbread concluded by moving, "that Henry Lord Viscount Melville be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanours." A long debate ensued, in the course of which Mr. Bond objected to an impeachment, as cumbrous and expensive, and moved, as an amendment, "that his Majesty's Attorney-General be directed to prosecute Henry Lord Viscount Melville for the several offences which appear from the report of the Commissioners of Naval Inquiry, and that of the select committee of the House of Commons, to have been committed by the said Henry Lord Viscount Melville." On a division of the House, the motion for impeachment was rejected by a majority of 77; and Mr. Bond's amendment for a criminal prosecution, adopted by a majority of 238 to 229 voices. It was, however, ultimately determined, on the 25th of June, that the mode of prosecution, by impeachment, should be resorted to, and Mr. Whitbread was appointed manager of the impeachment, with directions to acquaint the Lords, on the following day, with the determination of the Commons' House of Parliament. On this occasion, Mr. Pitt delivered his last speech in the senate, and argued strongly in favour of a trial by impeachment, in preference to proceedings by criminal prosecution.

The British cabinet was still in a divided state; and the conflicting sentiments of its members threatened to produce a partial change in the ministry, had no subject of paramount interest arisen to call them more strongly into action. It appears that, soon after the Easter recess, Lord Sidmouth suggested the propriety of removing Lord Melville from the privy council; but Mr. Pitt, wishing to avoid that measure, conceived that both Parliament and the country would be satisfied with the noble Lord's resignation of his office as First Lord of the Admiralty. Neither party was disposed to yield, and Lord Sidmouth, the Earl of Buckinghamshire, and Mr. Vansittart, expressed their determination to throw up their several appointments. This extremity was, however, for the present averted by the erasure of Lord Melville's name from the list of the privy council, and the vote of impeachment, which afterwards passed against that nobleman.* However, on the 5th of July, Lord Sidmouth, in conformity with this resolution, went out of office; and five days afterwards his example was followed by the Earl of Buckinghamshire. These noblemen were succeeded by Earl Camden and Lord Harrowby, while Lord Castlereagh was appointed to the foreign department; the office of First Lord of the Admiralty having been previously conferred on Sir Charles Middleton, who was called to the Upper House of Parliament under the title of Lord Barham.

* His Lordship described the difficulties he had encountered in all the endeavours which he had hitherto made to clear his character: and expressed his extreme satisfaction that he could now, in some measure, gratify his feelings upon this point, although he was limited in the range of his defence by the resolution of the Lords. He solemnly asserted, that he never knew that Mr. Trotter had drawn any money for the purposes of speculation; and declared that he had felt highly indignant at the charge that such transactions had been conducted with his privity; and that, in execution of them, Mr. Trotter had enjoyed the advantage of his (Lord Melville's) knowledge of the confidential secrets of government. His Lordship as positively denied his participations in the profits of Mr. Trotter. He admitted, that when the money was drawn for naval purposes, he had suffered that gentleman to place it in the house of Messrs. Coutts, until it should be wanted, instead of putting it into the iron chest, or transferring it to the custody of the respective sub-accountants; but, that he had ever given Mr. Trotter power to draw money from the bank indiscriminately, he protested was untrue; and, in lodging the money at a banker's, after it was fairly drawn out of the Bank for official purposes, by a competent authority, until it was claimed by the parties to whom it belonged, he contended that he violated no clause in the act of Parliament. He certainly did suppose the paymaster derived a profit from the sums invested in the hands of Messrs. Coutts, but he had never considered it as a clandestine, a secret, or an unlawful, proceeding. His Lordship said, the reason he had not directly disclaimed having any share in Mr. Trotter's profits, when he was examined before the committee was, because he had that moment been informed of the confusion in which his paymaster's accounts stood; and that, although there was a doubt in his own mind, whether he might not, in consequence of that circumstance, unintentionally have received what was his own property, from unlawful profits, he could then, as well as at the present time, have denied any participation, with his knowledge or volition. His Lordship referred to two sums of about 10,000*l.* each, which had come to his hands, as the confidential adviser of government, for the affairs of Scotland. The circumstances relative to them, he felt equally bound, by private honour and public duty, never to disclose; though he affirmed, in the most unqualified terms, that those sums were neither used nor meant to be employed for any object of profit by him. He had certainly directed his agent to procure for him the loan of 20,000*l.* for which he had paid regular interest; but it was not, till within the last six weeks, that he knew Mr. Trotter was the lender of the money. After explaining the nature of his transactions with respect to the loyalty loan, to which he subscribed the sum of 10,000*l.* his Lordship said, when he destroyed all vouchers, it was because he considered them useless; and certainly not from the most remote apprehension of danger from their existence. Lord Melville said, when he reviewed the past proceedings of Parliament, he could scarcely believe that an impeachment was intended, and he was equally incredulous with respect to an indictment. He observed, that he did not even yet despair of receiving justice from his deluded country, although he could not persuade himself to mention circumstances which it was his interest to explain.

† Another subject arising out of the 10th report of the Commissioners of Naval Inquiry, was a loan of 40,000*l.* of the public money made by government, with the privity of Mr. Pitt, to the private banking-house of Messrs. Boyd and Benfield. In introducing this transaction to the consideration of Parliament, Mr. Whitbread disclaimed all intention of imputing corrupt or improper motives to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he considered it necessary to prevent such a practice from being drawn into a precedent by future ministers, and recommended that a bill of indemnity should be introduced in favour of the existing government, to exonerate them from a transaction which was certainly illegal. The following resolution was, in consequence, moved by Mr. Lascelles:—"Resolved, that the measure of advancing 40,000*l.* to Messrs. Boyd and Co. upon unquestionable securities, which have been regularly discharged, was adopted for the purpose of averting consequences, that might have proved highly injurious to the commercial and financial interests of the country; and, although not conformable to law, appeared at the time to be called for by the peculiar exigency of public affairs." This resolution was adopted by the House, without a division, and Mr. Lascelles afterwards obtained leave to bring in a bill of indemnity, which passed into a law.

The domestic events of this summer were by no means such as to assist Mr. Pitt in bearing up against the attacks of disease with which he had long been assailed.† For more than four years, he had laboured under all the inconveniences resulting from a weak stomach, and the subsequent failure of appetite. And it will be easily conceived, that mental anxiety is peculiarly calculated to aggravate the effects of such a disorder. The unprosperous state of affairs on the Continent tended to increase his anxiety. The continued encroachments of Buonaparte, who, not content with usurping the imperial dignity in France, had assumed the crown of Italy, and annexed Genoa to his vast empire, had roused the spirits of the Austrians, and enabled Mr. Pitt to give life and vigour to a new confederacy against the colossal power of France. A treaty was concluded between Russia and England, to which Austria and Sweden soon acceded. The object of this treaty was to restore, in some degree, the balance of power in Europe, by driving the French out of Hanover and the North of Germany; by establishing the independence of Holland and Switzerland; by restoring the King of Sardinia to his throne and territory; and by compelling the French to evacuate the kingdom of Naples, and the whole of Italy. The means by which it was proposed to accomplish this great and desirable object was, an army of half a million of effective men, independently of the forces to be employed by Great Britain herself. This treaty was signed at St. Petersburgh, on the 11th of April. It developed a system of foreign policy, liberal, comprehensive, and grand; and had the Continental powers performed their part of the engagement, by supplying the stipulated force, there can be little doubt that the result would have been favourable to the independence of Europe. Providence, however, had otherwise determined. The campaign, which was opened late in September, proved short, disastrous, and decisive.‡ The cowardly surrender of an Austrian army, at Ulm, by General Mack, paved the way for further successes;

* The current of public opinion was decidedly unfavourable to the noble Viscount. The city of London took the lead, in presenting an address to his Majesty requesting him to remove his Lordship from his councils for ever; and various similar resolutions were voted in different parts of the country, couched in language of unqualified censure.

† One of the first measures adopted by Buonaparte after his elevation to the imperial dignity, was to transmit new overtures to the British government. This communication was conveyed in the form of a letter, written by Napoleon's own hand, and addressed to his Britannic Majesty. This unusual mode of communication, which he had before adopted upon his accession to his office of first consul, was chosen from a professed desire to disengage so important a transaction from the intrigues of cabinets and the perplexities and delays of diplomacy. After adverting to his recent elevation to the throne of France, and lamenting the unnecessary effusion of blood; he said he considered it no disgrace to take the first step towards conciliation; for though peace was the wish of his heart, war had never been inconsistent with his glory. As it had never been customary for the English Sovereign to communicate directly with a foreign potentate, an answer was returned by Lord Mulgrave, addressed to the French minister. The Secretary of State for foreign affairs intimated his Majesty's wish to procure the blessings of peace, on terms compatible with the permanent security of Europe; but stated the impracticability of more fully meeting the overture now made, until communications had been held with the powers of the Continent, with whom his Majesty was engaged in confidential connections and relations.

‡ Towards the close of the month of August, while he was at Boulogne, Buonaparte issued orders to dismantle the flotilla in that harbour, and directed the troops to march from the coast to the banks of the Rhine. Similar orders were at the same time transmitted to General Marmont, who commanded the army in Holland; and Marshal Bernadotte was directed to proceed with his force from Hanover towards Franconia. Buonaparte then quitted Boulogne and repaired to Paris. Bavaria, of whom strong suspicions were entertained by the allied powers, was summoned to incorporate her troops with the Austrian army, and the latter in full force passed the Inn early in the month of September, and endeavoured to enforce this command. As soon as intelligence was received at Paris that the Austrian army had entered the dominions of the Elector of Bavaria, the senate was convened, and in a speech from the throne, Buonaparte informed his senators that he was about to place himself at the head of his army in order to afford immediate assistance to his allies, and to defend the dearest interests of his people. On this occasion two important decrees were proposed; the one for the immediate levy of 80,000 conscripts, and the other for re-organizing and embodying the national guard. Buonaparte then appointed his brother Joseph to superintend the government in his absence, and on the following day he left Paris for Strasburgh.

By the allies, the resources of France were estimated at 651,000 men; and of this number it was supposed she might employ 500,000 in Italy, Germany, and Switzerland. In opposition to this force Austria could bring into the field 250,000 rank and file exclusive of the Russian armies which were destined to co-operate with her in the war, and was expected to swell her numbers to an equality with the force of the enemy. The first blow was to be struck in Italy, by forcing the passage of the Adige, dislodging the enemy from the Mincio, investing Mantua and Pescheira, and detaching a body of troops to the Po, to observe the south of Italy, and to open its way to the Adda, in order to cover the blockades or sieges of these places. It was foreseen that in Germany, Austria must sustain the first shock of French impetuosity, without the aid of her imperial ally; it was therefore determined that the Austrian corps should enter Bavaria, and taking a strong position on the Lech, await the arrival of the Russians, while the forces in the Tyrol were to be regulated in their motions by those of the armies of Italy and Germany. In pursuance of this plan, the Austrian army upon the Adige was increased to 120,000 men; and about the middle of September the Archduke Charles quitted Vienna for the purpose of assuming the command; at which period the French troops in Italy, under the command of General Massena, did not exceed 70,000 men. The Austrian army in Germany was intrusted to the command of Field-marshal Baron Mack, an officer that had for a considerable time enjoyed a very powerful influence over the military councils at the court of Vienna. The Austrian army, having traversed the electorate of Bavaria, arrived towards the end of September on the banks of the Lech. Abandoning that position immediately afterwards, they advanced to the Iller, and detachments were pushed towards Doneschingen and Stockach, and into the duchy of Wirtemberg. Besides the two armies stationed on the Adige and in Suabia, a considerable force was also assembled under the command of the Archduke John in the Tyrol, which was destined to act as the events of the campaign might require. On the 26th of September Buonaparte arrived at Strasburgh: on the same day the greater part of the French army, which had proceeded by rapid marches from the coast, passed the Rhine at Manheim, Spires, and Durlach, under the command of Marshals Davoust, Soult, and Ney. Marshal Lannes with his division, and the reserve of cavalry under Murat, had crossed the river on the preceding day at Kehl. The French army of Hanover, consisting of about 20,000 men, and commanded by Marshal Bernadotte, having marched by Gottingen and Frankfort, had arrived at the head-quarters of the Elector of Bavaria at Wurtzburg. In this position Bernadotte was soon after joined by General Marmont and the Gallo-Batavian army, which had crossed the Rhine at Mentz; and by this union the force collected at Wurtzburg amounted to upwards of 60,000 men. Buonaparte, to avoid the difficulties and inconveniences of penetrating through the passes of the Black Forest, had resolved to advance along the northern bank of the Danube, and passing the river below the position of the Austrians, to interpose his army between them and the Russian force. With a view to this movement, Marshal Bernadotte and General Marmont had been ordered to proceed to Wurtzburg. As the Austrian commander might by an immediate retreat have frustrated the success of this plan, it became necessary that this project should not only be disguised from the imperialists, but should be executed with the utmost possible rapidity. Murat was therefore ordered to manœuvre near the passes of the Black Forest, to deceive the Austrians, and to induce them to suppose that the French army intended to force its way in that direction. General Mack fell into the snare, and advanced with the greater part of his army to oppose the execution of this design. He had already fortified the banks of the Iller, and had issued orders to strengthen with the utmost expedition the positions of Memmingen and Ulm. At length, however, he discovered his error, and was compelled suddenly to change all his plans. In the mean time, the French army had traversed with almost incredible rapidity the electorate of Wirtemberg, and the plains of Nordlingen; and on the 16th of October, Marshal Soult arrived, at the head of his division on the successes;† and the battle of Austerlitz, fought on the 2d of December, at which the Emperors of Austria and Russia, and Buonaparte were present, completed the triumph of the French arms. The Austrian Emperor, dismayed by a loss, which he might easily, and soon, have repaired, solicited an immediate armistice, which the Danube, at Donawerth, and obtained possession of the bridge at Munster. On the 8th, General Marmont reached Neuberg, having penetrated through the Prussian neutral territory of Anspach, and shortly after Marshal Bernadotte, at the head of his division, arrived at Ingoldstadt. From this moment the issue of the campaign was decided. The army under General Mack did not exceed 80,000 men: a hostile force nearly double that amount was now posted in his rear; while his communication with the Austrian states, and with the Russian auxiliaries, the first division of which had not yet arrived on the Inn, was upon the point of being completely intercepted. On the 7th, a part of the French army passed the Danube at Donawerth, and the division commanded by Marshal Soult extended itself along the Lech to the city of Augsburg, and afterwards to Landsburg and Fuessen. In the mean time a strong detachment from the Austrian army was ordered to advance to Wertingen, for the purpose of observing the motions, and checking the progress of the enemy. This corps was attacked by the cavalry under Prince Murat, and the division commanded by General Lannes. The Austrians, after a short contest, in which they sustained considerable loss, were compelled to retire. On the following day a second action took place in the vicinity of Guntzburg; the division commanded by General Ney attacked the Austrians who were advantageously posted on the banks of the Danube, and, after a sharp conflict, forced the passage of the river, and remained masters of the bridges and strong position of Guntzburg. General Mack, alarmed by the accounts which he received of the strength of the enemy, was obliged to send for reinforcements to the Italian army. Prince Charles thus saw himself deprived of the means of pursuing those objects which he hoped to accomplish. The necessity however was urgent, and he ordered thirty battalions to march to the support of the Austrian army in Germany. Of this force a part only arrived on the banks of the Iller; some detachments were taken by the enemy, and the rest fell back upon the Tyrol. The Austrian army was stationed on the banks of the Iller, from Memmingen to the Danube; but its principal strength was collected on the left of this line, in the neighbourhood of Ulm; and the French were rapidly advancing with their whole force to that quarter. The situation of the Austrians became every hour more and more critical; they found themselves circumscribed and inclosed on every side; and the commander saw the necessity of endeavouring to dislodge the enemy from some of his positions. Accordingly, on the 11th of October, a vigorous attack was made upon a French division posted under the command of General Ney at Albeck. The enemy was driven to a considerable distance along the banks of the Danube; and the event of the day was highly honourable to the Austrians. But no important advantage resulted from the victory.

† After the battles of Guntzburg and Wertingen, Buonaparte repaired to the city of Augsburg, from which place he again returned on the 13th to the camp before Ulm; when he issued immediate orders to force the bridge and position of Echlingen. This post, of great importance in the present situation of the armies, was defended by a body of 16,000 Austrians. In this contest, which was long and obstinate, the French charged with their usual impetuosity; while the Austrians fought with all the fury of despair. Great numbers fell on both sides; but at length the Austrians were broken and driven from the field. The same day, after a series of sharp and stubborn conflicts, the French troops under General Lannes possessed themselves of the heights of Michel Malgen and Kuhe, in the vicinity of Ulm, while on the other side, General Marmont occupied the bridges at the confluence of the Iller and the Danube. The situation of the Austrian army was now desperate; it was nearly encircled by the enemy, and compelled to take refuge within the walls of Ulm. Two divisions, under Generals Hohenzollern and Werneck, had already been detached from the main army, and Prince Ferdinand, desirous to rescue a part of the troops from the disgrace of a capitulation, placed himself at the head of four squadrons of well-mounted cavalry, and proceeded with the utmost expedition towards Aalen. The two following days the French were employed in making preparations for a general assault. The city was surrounded by a broad ditch filled with water; and though the fortifications were weak and unfinished, yet a brave and veteran army, consisting of more than 30,000 men, might have made a fierce and dreadful resistance. Buonaparte, eager to avail himself of his present advantages to their full extent, issued an address to his soldiers on the 15th, in which he says, "Merely to conquer the enemy would be to do nothing worthy of yourselves or of your Emperor. Not a man should escape, and that government which has violated all its engagements, should first learn its catastrophe by your arrival under the walls of Vienna." This proclamation was immediately followed by a summons to General, Mack requiring him to capitulate, and threatening in case of refusal to storm the town. On the night of the 16th there arose a furious tempest; the waters of the Danube overflowed their banks; and many of the bridges upon that river, and among the rest the bridge of Echlingen, were swept away by the rapidity of the torrent. A favourable opportunity was thus afforded to the Austrian army to endeavour to force their way through the posts of the enemy; but the commander was deficient in enterprise and activity, and this unforeseen and fortuitous occurrence was suffered to pass unimproved. On the 17th the terms of the capitulation were finally settled. The garrison was allowed to march out with the honours of war, and after filing off to lay down their arms. The field-officers were permitted to return home upon their parole, but the subalterns and soldiers were sent prisoners to France. On the 20th the Austrians, according to the terms of a convention concluded the second day after the capitulation of Ulm, marched out of that city. Buonaparte, surrounded by his guards, occupied the heights near the town, and was a witness to this humiliating scene. Thirty thousand men, three thousand of whom were cavalry, with sixty pieces of cannon, and forty stands of colours, were paraded before the victor. Having sent for the Austrian Generals, and kept them near his person while the troops defiled, he complained of the injustice and aggression of the Emperor: "I desire nothing," said he, "on the Continent. France wants only ships, colonies, and commerce; and it is as much your interest as mine that I should have them."

No sooner did the intelligence of this disaster reach Vienna, than the houses were deserted, and the inhabitants crowded into the streets, anxiously inquiring into the particulars of the event. When the full extent of the calamity was known, the people gave vent to their feelings in the bitterest expressions of indignation and rage. They saw in their apprehensions the French already at their gates. They loudly exclaimed against General Mack as the author of their misfortunes, and openly charged him with having betrayed and sold his country to the enemy. The Emperor made every exertion to re-establish the public confidence, and to restore the tranquillity of his capital. It was ordered that all persons capable of bearing arms should be trained and embodied, and that every effort should be made to supply the deficiencies in the army. Instructions were at the same time issued to hasten the general levy in Hungary; and the Emperor published a proclamation, in which he appealed to the patriotism and loyalty of his subjects, and called upon them in the most earnest terms to unite with vigour for the protection of their country and his throne. Immediately after the capitulation of Ulm, the most active exertions were made by the enemy for the further prosecution of the campaign. The first divisions of the Russians, under the command of General Kutusoff, had already arrived upon the banks of the Inn, and uniting itself to the Austrians in that quarter, formed an army of nearly 70,000 men. It was of importance, if possible, to attack this force before the arrival of the second division, and with this view the French army having been joined by the contingents of Bavaria, Baden, and Wirtemburg, crossed the Iser at three different points, and advanced by rapid marches towards the Inn. The arrangements for the further prosecution of the campaign, on the immense theatre of war, were all completed. Marshal Ney's division, and the Bavarian army, were ordered to drive the Austrians from the Tyrol. The operations in the Voralberg were entrusted to Marshal Augereau, who from the interior of France had arrived with a considerable force at Stockach; and General Baraguay d'Hilliers was ordered to penetrate into Bohemia, and to observe the motion of the Austrians to the east. The French army which was advancing towards the Inn consisted of about 110,000 men, while the allied troops, stationed upon that river, scarcely amounted to 70,000. Judging it impolitic to hazard an action with such a disparity of strength, the allies determined to retire, to effect a junction with the second Russian division, which was advancing under General Buxhovden. From the Inn, the combined army retired behind the Ems, their rear occasionally skirmishing with the advanced guard of the enemy. In this situation of affairs, the Emperor of Austria endeavoured to avert the evils with which he was menaced by negociation. Count de Guilay accordingly repaired to the head-quarters of the enemy at Lintz, to propose an armistice, in order that negociations might be commenced for a general peace. Buonaparte, in answer, demanded, as the price of an armistice, that the Russian forces should return home, that the Hungarian levies should be disbanded, and that the Austrian troops should withdraw from the duchy of Venice and the Tyrol. It was evident that to accede to these terms would be to place the imperial crown at the mercy of Buonaparte; the Emperor therefore resolved still to struggle with his difficulties; and to trust to the support of his allies, to the fortune of his house, and to the zeal and affection of his people. In the mean time the principal force of the enemy advanced by the Ems and Amstten, while the Russians, continuing their retreat, retired to St. Polten. At Krems, not far from that place, there is a bridge over the Danube, which is the last bridge above the city of Vienna. The enemy had detached a considerable force over the river, under the command of Marshal Mortier, who was ordered to march with the utmost expedition for the purpose of seizing and destroying the bridge. By this manœuvre, the communication between the first and the second divisions of the Russian army would have been completely intercepted; but the Russians, aware of the design of the enemy, frustrated its execution, and after a rapid march from St. Polten to Krems, crossed the river at that place, and laid the bridge in ruins. It was now evening, and the situation of the allies, who were closely pressed upon the side of the Stein, became extremely critical. It was necessary to force the enemy from his position. Accordingly, at daybreak on the following morning, the Russian army having formed itself into three columns, advanced against the French lines with the utmost impetuosity; and after a smart contest put the enemy to the rout in every direction. In this engagement great numbers of the French were slain; many escaped in the vessels that had been collected on the river; and about 2,000 men, with a large proportion of officers, were taken prisoners. This victory, so important in the present situation of the army, was obtained without any considerable loss on the part of the Russians. There fell, however, in the heat of the engagement, the Austrian Field-marshal Schmidt, a veteran officer of great bravery and merit, whose death filled the army with regret. Buonaparte now removed his head-quarters to the beautiful abbey of Molk, built by the Emperor Commodus, and celebrated for having been one of the posts of the Romans. In the vaults of this magnificent building, he found prodigious stores of excellent Hungarian wine, which proved of great service to his army. From this moment, the fate of the Austrian capital was decided. The great road to Vienna lay open; and it was impossible to attempt the defence of the city which was granted, the very night of the battle,* on terms so disgraceful to himself, that his Imperial Ally, Alexander, refused to become a party to them. This was followed by the peace of Presburgh, signed on the 26th of December, which dissolved this new confederacy, and defeated the last hopes of Mr. Pitt. By that city without the walls. The court, the nobility, and all those who could provide the means of flight, had abandoned the city. The utmost agitation and confusion prevailed, and the public anxiety became intense from the accounts which were daily and hourly received, of the rapid advance of the enemy. But when the people were informed, that the Russian army, on which they reposed their last and only reliance, had passed the Danube and left the capital to its fate, they abandoned themselves to despair. On the 9th, a deputation of the inhabitants of Vienna, with Prince Sinzendorf at its head, repaired to the French camp, to declare the Emperor's intention to deliver up the metropolis, in order to preserve the people from impending distress; and that in so doing, he fully relied on the justice and generosity of Buonaparte, to carry his benevolent wishes into execution. The deputation were received by Murat; and after a short conference, in which they obtained the strongest assurances of protection, they returned to Vienna. Murat, in consequence of the arrangements which had been previously made, immediately entered the city, and his troops were conducted to the quarters which had been assigned for their accommodation. The Austrian force, which had retired from Vienna upon the approach of the enemy amounted to 10,000 men; and having crossed the Danube, they proceeded towards Moravia, for the purpose of forming a junction with the Russians. The French arrived at Vienna in successive divisions, and passed through that city with the utmost expedition in pursuit of the Russians. On the 14th, Buonaparte himself arrived at Vienna, and took up his residence in the castle of Schoenbrun, a small palace built by the Empress Maria Theresa. So rapid had been the progress of the French, and such was the consternation which prevailed, that no effectual measures had been adopted for the removal of the artillery and military stores from the city, in consequence of which neglect, 2,000 pieces of cannon, 200,000 muskets, and ammunition of every description, besides other articles of immense value, fell into the hands of the enemy.

The French were now in complete possession of Upper and Lower Austria, and it became necessary to establish a provincial administration for the government of these extensive conquests. For this purpose a code of regulations was soon prepared, and General Clarke was appointed Governor-General of the districts. These important arrangements having been completed, Buonaparte left Vienna and repaired to the army of Moravia. The French patroles of cavalry were already at the gates of Presburg; and a party of these troops intercepted a courier from Vienna, by whose dispatches they learned that the Archduke Charles, on hearing of the disasters at Ulm, had quitted the Italian territory, and was hastening with his army to the relief of Vienna. On the 18th of October, the Italian campaign was opened upon the Adige. The Austrian army was strongly posted at Veronetta, a suburb of the city of Verona, situated upon the left bank of the river; while the French troops, under the command of Marshal Massena, occupied the city upon the opposite bank of the Adige. The communication between Verona and its suburb was by means of two bridges, the new bridge and the bridge of the old castle; and both parties had guarded against the passage of these bridges by strong works raised at the opposite extremities. The Archduke Charles found himself so far weakened, in consequence of the reinforcements which he had dispatched for the support of General Mack, that he was no longer in a condition to undertake offensive operations against the position of the enemy; the attack was therefore begun by the French, and Massena determined to force a passage over the bridge of the old castle. After a fierce and obstinate struggle, the French General forced the passage of the bridge, and made himself master of the Austrian intrenchments upon the opposite bank of the river. The Austrian army, however, still maintained its position in Veronetta, and several days elapsed without any further attack; but the Archduke Charles having, in the mean time, obtained information of the disaster at Ulm, prepared to fall back with his force towards Vienna. It was not, however, till after an arduous contest that the Archduke made good his retreat, and took up a position under cover of the redoubts of Caldiero.

During these operations, General Hillinger, to whom was confided the command of an Austrian column, consisting of about 5000 men, was separated from the main army, and after exhausting every effort to extricate himself from his difficulties, was obliged to capitulate with his whole corps. The enemy, still continuing the pursuit of the army of the Archduke, arrived upon the Isonzo, having made himself master of the Austrian magazines at Palma and Udine, and from this position General Massena ordered a detachment to proceed to the left, towards Villach, for the purpose of opening a communication with the grand army. Whilst the Archduke Charles continued his retreat, the contending armies in the Tyrol and the Vorulberg were pursuing their operations. General Ney, with his corps, amounting to 17,000 men, after having quitted the neighbourhood of Memmingen, took a course towards Upper Bavaria. On the 4th of November, this General arrived in the environs of Partenkirch, and on the 5th, commenced an attack on the strongly fortified position of Scharnitz, situated two leagues to the south of Mittenwald. To these movements the militia and sharp-shooters, as well as the levy-en-masse of the Tyrol, favoured by the nature of the country, opposed a long and obstinate resistance; but, after a gallant struggle, this brave band of patriots was at length obliged to give way; and the fortress of Scharnitz, with 1,800 prisoners, one standard, and fifteen field-pieces, fell into the hands of the enemy. On the 16th, General Ney marched through Lecfield and Zierl, and after forcing the Archduke John to abandon his position on the stupendous mountains of Brenner, took possession of Inspruck, the capital of Upper Austria. During the short but vigorous campaign of the Tyrol, an Austrian column, under the command of the Prince de Rohan, had been totally separated from the main army by the manœuvres of the French in that country. Unwilling to surrender without an effort, the Prince determined, if possible, to effect a junction with the Archduke Charles by traversing the mountains which separate the Tyrol from Italy; but finding himself surrounded by the troops of General Partaneaux and General Regnier, and discovering that his position was turned by General St. Cyr, in the neighbourhood of Castel-Franco, he was forced to capitulate, and 6,000 infantry, 100 cavalry, six standards, and twelve pieces of cannon, with a considerable quantity of baggage and ammunition, fell into the possession of the enemy. The defence of the Voralberg had been entrusted to the Austrian General Jellachich, who was dispatched for that purpose from the main army in Suabia, previously to the fall of Ulm. In this service he was opposed by Marshal Augereau, at the head of a very superior force. A series of sharp encounters immediately took place, and the Austrians were driven in succession from position to position, till at length the concert of their movements being broken, their columns were separated, and the Commander-in-chief, with a force of from eight to 10,000 men, found himself compelled to capitulate in the neighbourhood of Feldkirk. The whole of the Voralberg, Pludentz, and the entire district of Arlemberg, together with the Austrian arsenals and magazines in those territories, were thus surrendered to the enemy, and it was agreed that the troops should not serve either against France or Italy for one year from the date of the capitulation. The violation of the neutrality of Anspach by the French troops under the command of General Marmont, had excited a deep sensation at Berlin; and the people of Prussia were still more exasperated than their government. The insult which the French ruler had given to the Prussian power effected what the allies had endeavoured in vain to accomplish, and an instant determination was taken to enter into the war. In order to encourage this resolution the British ministry sent Lord Harrowby to Berlin with the most liberal offers of pecuniary assistance; and, on the 26th of October, the Emperor Alexander, full of zeal for the cause in which he was engaged, visited the Prussian monarch, by whom he was welcomed with great cordiality, and received with princely distinction. The two sovereigns swore on the tomb of Frederick the Great to maintain an unalterable friendship. The armies of the Prussian monarchy, were, without delay, put on the war establishment; and several large bodies of troops actually marched to the south, and approached the scene of action. This force consisted of 220 squadrons of horse, 133 battalions of infantry, 12 companies of chasseurs, 40 batteries of heavy ordnance, and 12 divisions of flying artillery. But the cabinet of Berlin soon relapsed into its former system. Before any decisive step could be taken, General Mack had capitulated; and the Austrian army was completely dispersed. These events disposed Prussia to listen to terms of accommodation; and Count Haugwitz was ordered to proceed to the head quarters of the French army.

Soon after the breaking out of the war, an army amounting to upwards of fifteen thousand English and Russian troops was assembled in the Mediterranean, with the professed design of co-operating with the Austrian army in Italy, or of effecting a powerful diversion in their favour. Instead of landing in the Venetian territory, however, at an early period of the campaign, and supplying the place of those battalions which the Archduke Charles had found it necessary to dispatch to the aid of General Mack, a landing was not effected till the middle of November, in the neutral territory of Naples, and at a distance of several hundred miles from the nearest position of the enemy. Here, as might have been foreseen, this powerful auxiliary force remained entirely inactive.

Marshal Davoust, leaving the principal part of the French army at Vienna, proceeded with his division towards Presburg. On his arrival in the vicinity of that city he received overtures from Count Palfy the Governor, in the name of the Archduke Palatine, proposing that the military preparation in Hungary should be discontinued on condition that the French General would guarantee the neutrality of that kingdom. To this proposal Marshal Davoust yielded a ready acquiescence; and the principal resources of the House of Austria were thus reduced to the army which the Archduke Charles had with

* The scene of this tremendous battle was the heights of Pratzen, a range of mountains, with a small semi-circular inclination in the middle to the east, running from the lake of Menitz, nearly north and south to the distance of ten or eleven miles. At the foot of these mountains on the western side, and about a mile from the base of them, is a little stream, which on the north divides the defile between the parallel heights of Schlapanitz and Pratzen, and towards the south washes the plain of Turas. Between this stream and the fort of Pratzen, and in the vicinity of the plain of Turas on the west of the rivulet, are situated the various villages in which the French were posted, while the allied armies occupied the heights and the hamlets in the ravines to the east. At one o'clock in the morning of the 2d of December, Buonaparte mounted his horse, to inspect the posts, reconnoitre the piquets of his opponents, and to obtain an account of what the guards had been able to learn of the movements of the confederates. He was informed that they had passed the night in drunkenness, noise, and revelry; and that a corps of Russian infantry had appeared in the village of Sokolnitz, occupied by a regiment of the division under General Legrand. The day at length dawned. Surrounded by his Marshals, Buonaparte, who remained that treaty, Austria signed her own exclusion from Italy, and consented to an important loss of dominion in Germany. She sacrificed to her fears her faithful subjects of the Tyrol and the Voralberg, who were consigned, much against their will, to the Elector, now King of Bavaria, as a reward for his desertion of the lawful head so much skill and bravery conducted in the face of superior numbers from the Adige to the Danube, and to the small force of Prince John of Lichtenstein, which had united itself to the first division of the Russian army. Murat, with the French cavalry under his command, having crossed the Danube at Vienna, came up with the allied army of the Austrians and Russians at Hollabrun. By these movements the situation of General Kutusoff's army became extremely perilous. Perceiving the difficulties of his situation, he sent the Baron de Wintzingerode to Murat to propose terms of capitulation; and a convention, subject to the ratification of Buonaparte, was concluded, by which it was stipulated that the Russian army should retire by a prescribed route out of the Austrian dominions into their own territory; but Buonaparte, conceiving the Russians to be in his power, and desirous to signalize himself by a complete victory over their army, refused to ratify the convention. In the mean time, General Kutusoff had retired with the utmost expedition to Znaim, leaving the division, under Prince Bagration opposed to the enemy. The determination of Buonaparte not to ratify the convention was communicated to the Prince without delay, and upon the expiration of the time limited for the suspension of hostilities, his division, consisting of 6,000 men, was surrounded and attacked by a French force 30,000 strong. The Prince, who had embraced the magnanimous resolution to cut his way through the enemy, succeeded, after displaying prodigies of valour, and arrived with comparatively little loss at the head-quarters of Wischau. On the 18th of November, Buonaparte entered Znaim, where the Russians in their hurry and retreat to Brunn, had been compelled to leave their sick, besides a large supply of flour and other provisions. General Sebastiani, to whose brigade of dragoons the pursuit of the retreating Russian force was confided, favoured by the extensive plains of Moravia, cut off several corps of their rear-guard, and made 2 000 prisoners. In the mean time the cavalry force, under Murat, advanced to Brunn, which was evacuated on their approach, and by the possession of which they became masters of sixty pieces of cannon, immense stores of powder, and a very seasonable supply of corn, meal, and clothing. On the 20th, Buonaparte arrived at Brunn, and received a deputation from the Moravian States with a Bishop at their head. The French pursued their advantages in every direction. Ney was already master of Brixen, and General Bernadotte occupied Iglau, on the confines of Bohemia. Many prisoners, and much baggage fell into their hands in several petty affairs between the 20th, and the 23d, on the latter of which days they had pushed their reconnoitring parties to the gates of Olmutz. The combined forces at that place amounted to about 100,000 men; the Russians formed the greater part of this number; for the remnant of the Austrian army, which was placed under the command of Prince John of Lichtenstein, did not exceed 25,000 effective soldiers, and of this number a considerable proportion were raw levies, harassed by constant exertions, dispirited by defeat, and enfeebled by continual privations. The condition of the Russian troops was still more unfavourable. Exhausted by forced marches, and reduced by hunger and fatigue, dearth, misery, and desolation, encircled the armies of the coalesced sovereigns. The provinces to a great distance around them were wasted. The total failure of provisions and forage was alone sufficient to prevent them from maintaining the position before Olmutz, or to take another station further in the rear; and no alternative remained but to commit the fortunes of the campaign to the last desperate valour of their troops. A general battle had therefore become indispensible, but it was necessary to gain time for the purpose of concentrating their forces, and to enable the Russians to present a numerous and imposing front to the enemy. Delay, indeed, was the object of both parties; Bernadotte had not yet joined Buonaparte; and it is well known that the French have always been peculiarly studious to obtain the advantage of physical strength and the power of numbers. As soon as Buonaparte was apprised of the arrival of the Emperor of Russia in his camp, he sent his Aid-de-Camp, General Savary, to compliment that prince in terms of the most courteous civility, and to propose to him an interview. The Imperial Sovereign declined a personal conference, but he suffered the French General to remain within his lines for three successive days, where he did not fail to avail himself of the advantages presented by his singular situation. Although the Emperor Alexander did not choose to meet Buonaparte in person, he sent his aid-de-camp, Prince Dohgoruski, to explain his sentiments to the French chief. In the mean time Savary had returned to the French camp, and reported to his master the observations which he had been so indiscreetly allowed to make. Napoleon was informed that the Russian Generals, in spite of the deplorable state of their troops, relied fully on themselves; and that presumption, imprudence, and indiscretion reigned in their military councils. Availing himself of this intelligence, he issued orders for his army to retire, as if apprehensive of an engagement with so formidable an enemy. In order to strengthen this impression, the retreat was made under cover of the night, and the French army took up a strong position about ten miles in the rear of its former station. Here the troops began to throw up intrenchments, and to form batteries, as if for the purpose of defending themselves against the attacks of a hostile army. Every thing wore the appearance of alarm and confusion. When Prince Dobgoruski made his appearance, Buonaparte, as if anxious to conceal from the observation of the Prince, both the temper of his army, and the measures which he had adopted, received him, contrary to his general practice, at his out-posts. Preparations had been artfully made for this interview. Wherever the Russian directed his eye, he discovered the symptoms of anxiety and dismay. The troops were labouring with the utmost activity at the intrenchments, all the posts were doubled; every precaution seemed to be taken to guard against surprise; and so completely was the Aid-de-Camp of the Emperor Alexander impressed with the belief that the French army was on the eve of its ruin, that as a preliminary arrangement to pacification, he proposed to Buonaparte to place Belgium at the disposal of the allies, and to resign the throne of Italy to the King of Sardinia. These dispositions appear to have been attended with the desired effect. The confidence of the Russians increased; they considered the victory as secure, and were anxious only to prevent the escape of the enemy. The head-quarters of the Emperor of Russia, and the Emperor of Germany, were removed to Austerlitz, and M. de Kutusoff, the Commander-in-chief, ordered a powerful division to march to the left, for the purpose of turning the right flank of the French army. The confederates executed the orders of their Generalissimo in five columns. The first, under Lieutenant-General Dochtorow, took possession of the eminences of Klein-bostieradeck; and a regiment of chasseurs occupied Aujest, situated at the foot of the mountain near the lake of Menitz. The second, led by Lieutenant-General Langeron, posted itself on the heights of Pratzen to the right of the first column. The third, commanded by Lieutenant-General Pizibischewski, took its position on the same mountain to the right of the village of Pratzen. The fourth, under the orders of Lieutenant-General Kollowrath, partly intersected the heights from Auzterlitz to Brunn, and partly stationed itself in the rear of the third column. The fifth consisted of cavalry, and was under the direction of Prince John of Lichtenstein. It followed the course of the third column, behind which it was formed under the mountains. The Grand Duke Constantine drew up the reserve on the hills near Austerlitz, a little to the rear of the whole army; while Prince Bagration threw forward the advanced corps by Holubitz and Blasowitz; in order to give facility to the third and fourth columns in marching on their points of destination; and Lieutenant-General Kienmayer proceeded by Pratzen to the front of Aujest. The head-quarters were established at Krzenowitz. No attempt was made to interrupt these motions; and the enemy even withdrew his videttes as far as Telnitz and Sokolnitz. Buonaparte saw from the heigths of Schlapanitz with inexpressible joy, the whole of the movements of the allied army, and turning to his attendants repeatedly exclaimed, "Before to-morrow night that army will be in my power." This prediction proved too true. The Russians continued their march at a short distance along the front of the French lines. The enemy still preserved the same cautious and timid appearance; his troops remained inactive in their respective stations; and Murat, having advanced at the head of a small body of cavalry into the plain between the two armies, instantly retired with the utmost speed, as if astonished at the force and confounded by the movements of the allies. When the day had closed, Buonaparte determined to proceed on foot incognito through the several quarters of his camp, for the purpose of discovering the temper, dispositions, and opinions of his army. His person, however, was soon recognized, and in an instant lighted straw was raised upon a thousand poles. It was the eve of the anniversary of his coronation, and eighty thousand men presented themselves before him, and rent the skies with acclamations. Upon his return to his tent, he made the dispositions and issued the necessary orders for battle. Marshal Davoust was directed to march with the utmost expedition to Raygern, for the purpose of keeping the Russians in check upon the right, and General Gudin was ordered to advance at break of day, with his corps from Nicolsburgh, to oppose that part of the Russian division which should extend itself beyond the position of Davoust. The command of the right wing of the army which was stationed next to Davoust's corps, was entrusted to Marshal Soult. Marshal Bernadotte commanded the centre, and Marshal Lannes the left, the flank of the latter being protected by the position of Santon, strongly fortified and defended by eighteen pieces of cannon. The whole of the cavalry, under the command of Prince Murat, was posted between the left wing and the centre. Buonaparte himself, attended by Marshal Berthier, his Aid-de-camp, General Junot, and all his etat-major, commanded the reserve, which was composed of ten battalions of the imperial guard, and the ten battalions of the grenadiers of Oudinot, with forty pieces of cannon.

with the reserve, waited only for the horizon to clear up to issue his last orders. The sun appeared to be rising with extraordinary splendour, and held out the promise of a clear autumnal day. As soon as his first beams shot above the heights of Pratzen, the orders were issued, and each Marshal hastened to join his corps. Buonaparte, in passing along the front of several regiments, exclaimed: "Soldiers! we must finish this campaign by a thunder-bolt, which shall confound the pride of our enemies." This appeal was received with extacy by the forces, who, placing their hats on the points of their bayonets, exclaimed, "Vive l'Empereur!" The sound of a furious cannonade drowned their acclamations. The engagement had begun on the right. The allies conceived that by passing the defiles in the neighbourhood of Sokolnitz, and the other villages, the right of the enemy would be effectually turned; and that by avoiding the formidable ravines, which would obstruct their manœuvres, they might have an opportunity of executing their further intentions with advantage in the plain between Schlapanitz and the wood of Turas. They then proposed to press sharply on the enemy's right flank, by attacking it vigorously with numerous and compact bodies of troops, in rapid succession. This movement was to be covered by the right of the allies, with the cavalry of Prince John of Lichtenstein, and the advanced corps under Prince Bagration. The five columns were then head of the empire, and for his attachment to the general enemy of the civilized world.*

Such exertions, however, as depended, exclusively, on Great Britain, were eminently successful. In every quarter her fleets drove the enemy before them, and vindicated her right to rule,—the mistress of the sea. As early as the month of January, after having remained in port two years, a French squadron, consisting of six sail of the line, and two frigates, quitted the port of Rochefort, and ventured out to sea, with the view to unite itself with the more formidable force at Brest. On the 15th of the same month, the Toulon fleet, then put in march for the heights, and the fortune of the day was made to depend on the success of this attempt to drive back the enemy's right wing. Lieutenant-General Kilnmayer, who was to force the hollow valley of Tellnitz, and open the route for the first column, lost both time and advantage by commencing the attack with an insufficient force. The Austrians had already been engaged about an hour, and had suffered greatly from the French sharp-shooters, who took advantage of the ground, covered as it was with vineyards, and intersected by wet ditches, before M. de Buxhovden, with the first column of the Russians, made his appearance. At length, however, he arrived, and detached a battalion to support the Austrians. At nine o'clock, the enemy was strengthened by 4,000 men, from the corps under Davoust, and took advantage of a thick fog, which suddenly obscured the valley, to regain the ground they had lost. When the mist cleared up, the French were driven back, and forced to abandon the plain between Tellnitz and Turas; but the communication between the first and second columns of the allied armies was not yet established; in consequence of which, it was found impossible to follow up this advantage. By this time, the second and third columns of Russians had quitted the heights of Pratzen, and approached to Sokolnitz. A blind rage seemed to actuate their movements; for without concerning themselves about the fourth column, and without attending to the offensive movements of the enemy, they thought of nothing but the first disposition, and continued their progress upon Sokolnitz; of which they took possession with little resistance after a long and useless cannonade. General Kutusoff, who never conceived the possibility of being attacked on the heights, although it is difficult to conjecture on what grounds his ill-fated security was constructed, was surprised in the midst of his combinations by an unexpected and vigorous assault on his centre, made by the massy columns which Buonaparte ordered to advance for that purpose. The faults committed by the Russian General, had not failed to strike his eagle-eyed adversary, who perceived the advantage to be drawn from the circuitous route that the left wing of the allies was obliged to take. This wing, which became every moment more distant from their centre, still marched forward with the most surprising want of attention to military combination. Bernadotte having crossed the rivulet by a narrow and ruinous bridge, attained the eminence of Blasowitz, supported by the cavalry of Murat, and by Lannes with his grand division.

From this time, the centre and right of the allies became engaged in all quarters. The confederates evinced no want of impetuous gallantry: several brilliant charges of cavalry were made on their part, which, owing to the precipitate courage of the Hulans, whose fiery temperament could not wait for the formation of the rest of the line, were very destructive to themselves as well as to their opponents. The centre of the allies, unsupported by the third column, had to sustain the fury of the French troops. Twelve thousand men were attacked by twice that number, and though the whole of the French army was inferior to that of the allies in strength, yet by a more happy arrangement of its force, its numbers were doubled on the point where the fate of the battle was to be decided. Field-Marshal Kutusoff conceiving himself to be the assailant, was confounded by these offensive operations; yet he felt all the importance of maintaining the heights of Pratzen. When he was informed that the adverse forces were so near, he gave orders to his troops to draw up in front; and at the same time, sent for a reinforcement of four regiments of dragoons, from the cavalry of Prince John of Lichtenstein. The French directed the march of their two compacted bodies of infantry, with great coolness and at a slow pace. A third corps commanded by Marshal Soult, now made its appearance on the right of Pratzen, and threatened to pierce through the intervals of the allies. To oppose this movement, the infantry of the fourth Russian column came up to support the advanced guard, which, being overpowered by numbers, abandoned its post. In the mean time, the enemy continued to advance, and by the immense superiority of his force, succeeded in making himself master of the heights. The Russian division, which had marched to the left, was thus completely separated from the main army; and it was evident that the battle was lost unless the communication could be restored. In this emergency, the imperial guard, commanded by the Archduke Constantine, was ordered to advance, and by its impetuous charge, for a moment arrested the progress of the enemy. Marshal Bessieres was ordered to hasten at the head of the French guards to repair this disaster. The two corps were soon engaged; the fate of the day depended upon the issue of this contest; and the struggle was fierce and desperate. The allies returned to the charge with increased fury, and were received by the French with a steady and well directed fire, which made dreadful carnage in the closely united ranks of the Russians. The ardour of this assault quickly evaporated. The superior numbers of the French, and their steadiness, soon changed it to a slow and uncertain pace, accompanied by ill-directed vollies from firelocks. The fourth Russian column now lost the heights of Pratzen, beyond the possibility of recovery, together with the greater part of its artillery, which was buried in the deep clay, which pervades that part of the country. The only expedient which remained, was retreat; and every possible exertion was made by the subordinate Generals to conduct it without confusion. The action on the heights of Pratzen continued nearly two hours. The fourth column marched upon Waschau, where it collected its battalions unmolested by the enemy. The Grand Duke Constantine, and General Ulanius, highly distinguished themselves with their cavalry; the latter in protecting and disengaging the right, and the former in covering both wings of the allies; but their corps suffered severely from the dexterity and rapid manœuvres of the sharp-shooters, and from a battery of eighteen pieces of cannon, which discharged an incessant and well-pointed shower of grape-shot, overwhelmed both men and horses in one common ruin, and occasioned a slaughter that neither courage nor numbers could withstand. The second and third columns had become entangled at Sokolnitz, during the fog, and mutually embarrassed each other. Part of the centre of the allies had already penetrated this village, where they were turned and cut off by General Franceschi, and compelled to surrender, while Lieutenant-General Przibischewski, who had the command of the third column, shared the fate of Prince Repnin, and was made prisoner in the valley together with 6000 men. Informed when it was too late, of the attack on the centre, Lieutenant-General Dochtorow intended to return to its support, but took a wrong direction; and perceiving the irretrievable posture of affairs, he retired upon Aujest, followed by the remains of the second column, which fell back on the first. No sooner had this part of the defeated army gained the village, than the enemy rushed like a mountain cataract upon the place, which he carried, and possessed himself of four thousand prisoners. Driven to desperation, many of the flying troops betook themselves to the lake, which was too slightly frozen to bear their weight; and the waters engulphed these lacerated and unhappy men, victims at the same moment of two opposite elements; for the French had by this time brought up their batteries of flying artillery, which at once swept the lake and plain with a continual fire. Before two o'clock in the afternoon, the action was decided along the rest of the line; when the division of Vandamme rapidly approached to confirm the general rout. Behind Tellnitz, is a hill of considerable altitude, the right of which extends to the lake. Thither the Russian infantry retired, still under the protection of the Austrian cavalry; which a perpetual cross fire of grape-shot cut down in all directions. Worn out with fatigue, the infantry continued to retire with tardy steps, and the cavalry had to maintain their ground for a long time. At length the enemy took possession of the hill, when the Austrian cavalry quitted it, and the former persevered in plying the fugitives with cannon shot, until they were out of the range of the guns. About 8000 men of the first and second columns were thus brought off, and marched the whole night by Boschowitz, under incessant and drenching rain, which rendered the roads nearly impassable. The artillery, except that appertaining to the brave regiment of O'Reilly, was of course all lost in the retreat. Buonaparte possessed himself of the ground on which the allies had been drawn up on the preceding night. The two Emperors having exerted themselves to the utmost of their power to repair the disasters of the battle, retired in the evening to Hodiegitz, behind Austerlitz, with the wretched remains of their army. The Austrian cavalry posted some detachments before Austerlitz, and acted as the rear guard of the allies.

The loss in this engagement fell principally upon the Russians, and is said by the enemy, to have amounted to 32,000 in killed and wounded, and 20,000 prisoners. In opposition, however, to this statement, it was asserted, in the official account afterwards published at St. Petersburgh, that the entire loss in the campaign, did not exceed on the part of the Russians 17,000 men. The two commanders Kutusoff and Buxhovden, with several other Generals, and a great number of officers of rank were wounded; numbers were among the slain, and many were taken prisoners. One hundred and twenty pieces of cannon, and forty standards, fell into the hands of the enemy. This battle, which was styled by the French soldiers, "The battle of the three Emperors," and by Napoleon "the battle of Austerlitz," terminated the campaign and the war. On the 4th, two days after the engagement, an interview took place at the French advanced posts, between Napoleon and the Emperor of Austria, and an armistice was agreed upon, in which it was stipulated that the Russian army, should within a limited time withdraw from the territories of Austria. Count Haugwitz, the Prussian ambassador, had arrived at Vienna on the 30th of November; and shortly afterwards set out for the head-quarters of the French army, at Brunn. Buonaparte, in his conferences with this minister, expressed the warmest esteem and attachment for Prussia, and his earnest desire to preserve peace with that country. The fate of the war with the allied powers was already decided; Count Haugwitz saw the necessity of relaxing from his demands; and this dispute which had promised such important consequences to Europe was speedily adjusted. One of the principal stipulations of the treaty concluded upon this occasion, secured the eventual cession of Hanover to Prussia, in exchange for some of her detached and more remote dependencies.

* The provisions of this memorable treaty were, that the Venetian territory should be united in perpetuity to the kingdom of Italy; that the royal title, which had been assumed by the Electors of Bavaria and Wurtemburg, should be acknowledged by the Emperor;—that the margraviate of Burgau, the principality of Eichstadt, the part of the territory of Passau, belonging to the Elector of Saltzburg, the country of the Tyrol, comprehending the principalities of Brixen and Botzen, and the seven Lordships of the Voralberg, the county of Hohenems, the county of Konigsegg-Rothenfels, the Lordships of Tetnang and Argen, and the town and territory of Lindau, should be ceded fleet, consisting of eleven sail of the line, and two frigates, with 9,000 troops on board, following the example of the Rochefort fleet, pushed out to sea without being perceived by the blockading squadron, under Lord Nelson. After a short cruise, the Toulon fleet was obliged again to put into port through stress of weather. But in the West Indies, an attack was made on the island of Dominica by a French force, consisting of one three decker, four seventy-fours, and some frigates. On the 22d of February, a landing was attempted between the town of Roseau and the post of Cacherow by the enemy's force, consisting of 4,000 men, under General le Grange, embarked in nineteen large barges, attended and protected by an armed schooner full of men, and seven other boats carrying carronades. Brigadier-General Prevost, the Governor, made the most judicious dispositions for the defence of the island, and with the small force under his command, resisted the landing of the enemy inch by inch. The town of Roseau, after withstanding a vigorous cannonade from the enemy's ships, accidentally took fire, and was obliged to capitulate. But the British General, by a forced march, made good his retreat to St. Rupert's. In this situation he was in vain summoned to surrender, and the French commander-in-chief, finding the conquest so much more difficult than he had anticipated, abandoned the island, but not till he had levied a heavy contribution on the inhabitants of Roseau.—Pursuing this predatory system of warfare, the French fleet visited the islands of St. Nevis and St. Kitt's, both of which were laid under contributions. The arrival of Admiral Cochrane in the West Indies soon determined the conduct of this marauding squadron, which precipitately sailed for France, where it arrived in safety.

The alarm created in the public mind, respecting the proceedings of the Rochefort squadron in the West Indies had scarcely subsided, when that feeling was again awakened in a more powerful degree by the arrival of certain information, that Admiral Villeneuve had again put to sea. On the 30th of March, this officer sailed to Carthagena with the intention of strengthening himself by the Spanish ships of the line in that port, but not finding them in a state of sufficient readiness, he continued his course unmolested to Cadiz. Having been joined there by one French and six Spanish sail of the line, he directly steered to the West Indies, with an accumulated force of eighteen sail of the line, carrying beside their full complement of seamen, and in a perfect state of equipment, 10,000 veteran troops.

On the approach of Villeneuve to Cadiz, Admiral Sir John Orde, charged with the blockade of that port, with five British ships of the line, thought it prudent to retire, and succeeded in joining the English fleet off Brest under Lord Gardener. The welcome account, however, soon arrived, that Lord Nelson had left the Mediterranean, and was in pursuit of the enemy to the West Indies. Lord Nelson, it is true, had with him only ten ships of the line to oppose the force of the hostile squadrons, but his name was a tower of strength, on which the community placed the firmest reliance. The expedition of Lord Nelson had been such that on the 15th of May, he was twenty leagues to the eastward of Madeira, and on the 4th of June, he came to anchor in Carlisle Bay, off Barbadoes. Here his Lordship learnt, that the combined fleet under Admiral Villeneuve, had arrived at Martinique on the 14th of May, but that the Diamond Rock was the only conquest hitherto achieved by this powerful armament. Notice was soon after received that the combined fleets, after remaining some time at Martinique, had sailed for Europe, and that Lord Nelson was in pursuit of them. Sanguine hopes were now entertained that the enemy would be intercepted by Sir Robert Calder, or Admiral Collingwood, before he could reach any friendly port. Accordingly, on the 22d of July, the hostile fleet, consisting of twenty sail of the line, three fifty gun ships, five frigates, and two brigs, fell in with Sir Robert Calder's squadron, amounting to no more than fifteen sail of the line, two frigates, a cutter, and a lugger, six leagues west of Cape Finisterre. Sir Robert, notwithstanding the inferiority of his force, immediately attacked the enemy, and after an engagement of four hours, in which he displayed the greatest gallantry and skill, succeeded in taking two ships of the line, the St. Raphael, of eighty-four guns, and El Firme, of seventy-four. He then judged it expedient to put a stop to the action, in order that his squadron might cover his captures. During the whole day, the enemy had the advantage of wind and weather. The night was spent by both fleets in the necessary repairs, and the following morning the enemy seemed disposed to renew the action, but he never approached nearer the British lines than four leagues. At night the fleets were about six leagues asunder; and when the day broke on the 24th, the enemy was seen steering away to the south-east, which course he kept till he disappeared at about six o'clock in the evening. In England, the conduct of Sir Robert Calder became the subject of the most unreserved disapprobation; and the court-martial, which sat in judgment upon Sir Robert, sentenced him to be severely reprimanded "For not having done his utmost to take and to destroy every ship of the enemy, which it was his duty to engage." On this point, however, a more liberal, and a more just opinion was afterwards established, in favour of this truly gallant but unfortunate officer.

The combined fleets collected at Cadiz, under the command of Admiral Villeneuve, were now known to be in the most active state of refitment. Scarcely had Lord Nelson arrived in London, after his long and persevering cruise, when he was offered the command of an armament, to be prepared immediately, of sufficient force to cope with the united naval force of France and her allies. His Lordship, without a moment's hesitation, embraced the opportunity of again bearing his country's flag. Invested with this high and distinguished command, his Lordship quitted England on the 16th of September, in his flag ship the Victory, accompanied by the Ajax and Defiance, of seventy-four guns each, the Agamemnon, of sixty-four, and a frigate, and on the 29th of the same month arrived off Cadiz. Here his Lordship was received by the officers and crews of the fleet with the most gratifying enthusiasm; and the first object of his wishes appears to have been to induce the enemy to quit the port and to come out to sea. In consequence of this design he never kept more than seven or eight sail of the line before Cadiz, remaining himself with the rest of his forces near Cape St. Mary, while a line of frigates were formed to communicate with the several divisions of the armament.

ceded to the King of Bavaria:—that the five cities of the Danube, to wit, Ehingen, Munderkingen, Reidlingen, Mengen, and Sulgaw, with their dependencies, the city of Constance excepted, and a part of the Brisgaw, should be ceded to the King of Wurtemburg; and the remainder of the Brisgaw, the Otensaw, the city of Constance, and the commandery of Meinau, to the Elector of Baden; that the King of Bavaria should be allowed to occupy the city of Augsburg with its territory, and unite it to his other dominions, and that the King of Wurtemburg should be permitted to do the same with respect to the county of Bondoff. It was on the other hand stipulated in favour of the Emperor, that the county of Saltzburg, and that of Berchtolsgaden, belonging to the Archduke Ferdinand, should be incorporated with the Austrian empire; and Napoleon engaged to procure, as an equivalent for that Prince, the cession by the King of Bavaria of the principality of Wurtzburg. It was also agreed, in conformity with the declaration made by Napoleon, at the moment when he assumed the crown of Italy, that as soon as the parties named in that declaration should have fulfilled the conditions which it expressed, the crowns of France and Italy should be separated for ever, and should not in any case be united on the same head. It was further stipulated, that the prisoners of war taken on both sides, should be restored within forty days from the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty; that in ten days from the same date, the armies of France and her allies, should evacuate Moravia, Bohemia, the Viertel Unter Viennner Wald, the Viertel Unter Manhartsburg, Hungary, and the whole of Styria; in the ten following days, they should evacuate the Viertel Vienner Wald, and the Viertel Ober Manhartsburg; and that finally, in the space of two months from the exchange of the ratifications, they should withdraw from the whole of the hereditary states, with the exception of Brannau, which should remain for one month at the disposal of the French, as a place of depot for the sick and for the artillery. This treaty was signed at Presburg, on the 26th of December, and ratified by Buonaparte on the following day; after which he immediately proceeded to Munich, on his return to France.

The

The Admirals of the blockaded squadron had been ordered to put to sea, in case their opponents should be weakened by detachments, or compelled by the weather to quit the station. It was supposed to be their intention to collect in their cruise the squadron at Carthagena, and to make for Toulon; where their number of ships would have been increased to between forty and fifty sail of the line, with which it was conjectured to be the enemy's intention to prevent the British and Russian troops in Malta and Corfu from co-operating with the allied forces in Italy and Germany. On the 19th of October, Lord Nelson dispatched Admiral Louis with six sail of the line to Tetuan for stores and water. Informed of this event, and supposing the English to be much reduced in strength, Admiral Villeneuve availed himself of the favourable juncture to obey the positive commands which had been issued by his government. On the next day the fleet under his command got under weigh, and at day break on the 21st, was distinctly seen from the Victory's deck, formed in a close line of battle off Cape Trafalgar, about twelve miles to leeward of the British fleet, and standing to the south. Our fleet consisted of twenty-seven sail of the line, and four frigates; theirs of thirty-three sail of the line, and seven frigates, and their superiority was greater in size and weight of metal than in numbers. Admiral Villeneuve was a skilful seaman, and his plan of defence was as well conceived, and as original as the plan of attack. The Spaniards were commanded by Admiral Gravina; and 4,000 troops were embarked on board the fleet, under the command of General Contamin, among whom were several of the most skilful sharp-shooters that could be selected, and many Tyrolese riflemen. Lord Nelson, confident of a triumphant issue, asked Captain Blackwood, on the morning of the 21st, what he should consider a victory? and being answered that from the situation of the land he should think it would be a glorious result if fourteen of the enemy's ships were captured, he replied, "I shall not be satisfied with less than twenty." Soon afterwards he asked the Captain if he did not think there was a signal wanting. Captain Blackwood said, he thought that the whole fleet seemed very clearly to understand what they were about. These words were scarcely spoken before the signal was made, which will be as imperishable as the achievements of the British navy itself; it was Lord Nelson's last signal—"England expects every man to do his duty." The shout with which this inspiring sentiment was received was truly sublime. "Now," said Lord Nelson, "I can do no more. We must trust to the great disposer of all events, and the justice of our cause. I thank God for this great opportunity of doing my duty." He then retired to his cabin, and wrote the following prayer:—"May the great God whom I worship, grant to my country, and for the benefit of Europe in general, a great and glorious victory: and may no misconduct in any one tarnish it; and may humanity after victory be the predominant feature in the British fleet! For myself individually, I commit my life to him that made me; and may his blessing alight on my endeavours for serving my country faithfully! To him I resign myself, and the just cause which is entrusted to me to defend.—Amen, Amen, Amen."

His Lordship made the signal for the British fleet to bear up in two columns, as they formed in the order of sailing; a mode of attack which he had previously directed, to avoid the inconvenience and delay in forming a line of battle in the usual manner. The enemy formed with great closeness and correctness; and as the mode of attack was unusual, so the structure of their line was new; it formed a crescent convexing to leeward; so that in leading down to their centre, Lord Collingwood had both their van and rear abaft the beam. Before the fire opened, every alternate ship was about a cable's length to windward of her second a-head and a-stern, forming a kind of double line, and appeared, when on their beam, to leave a very little interval between them, and this without crowding their ships. Admiral Villeneuve was in the Bucentaure in the centre, and the Prince of Asturias bore Gravina's flag in the rear; but the French and Spanish ships were mixed, without any apparent regard to order of national squadron. As the mode of our attack had been previously determined on, and communicated to the flag officers and Captains, few signals were necessary, and none were made, except to direct close order as the lines bore down. The commander-in-chief, in the Victory, led the weather column, and the Royal Sovereign, which bore Lord Collingwood's flag, the lee. Lord Collingwood, the second in command, having the entire direction of his line, was to break through the enemy about the twelfth ship from their rear: Lord Nelson was to lead through the centre, and the advanced squadron was to cut off three or four a-head from the centre. This plan was adapted to the strength of the enemy, so that they should always be one-fourth superior to those whom they cut off. The two columns of the British fleet continued to advance, with light airs, and all sails set towards the van and centre of the enemy, whose line extended about N.N.E. and S.S.W.

In order to cut off any possibility of the enemy's escaping to Cadiz, Lord Nelson steered about two points more to the north than Admiral Collingwood, owing to which the leading ships of the lee line were the first engaged. The Royal Sovereign and her line of battle steered for the centre. At half-past eleven A. M. the enemy began to fire on the Royal Sovereign, "See," exclaimed Nelson, "how that noble fellow, Collingwood, carries his ship into action!" In ten minutes afterwards the Royal Sovereign opened her fire, and cut through the enemy's line a-stern of the Spanish Santa Anna, of 112 guns, engaging her at the muzzle of her guns on the starboard side; when, being delighted at having got into action, Collingwood, turning to his Captain, said, "Rotherham, what would Nelson give to be here?" The weather column, led on by Lord Nelson, had, in the mean while, advanced towards the enemy's van; flags had been hoisted on different parts of the Victory's rigging by his orders, lest a shot should carry away her ensign. The Santissima Trinadada, and Bucentaure, are described as having been the ninth and tenth ships, but as the enemy's Admirals did not shew their flags, the former ship was only distinguished from the rest by having four decks; and to the bow of this formidable opponent Lord Nelson ordered the Victory to be steered. The enemy at first displayed considerable coolness; and as the Victory approached, such of the ships as were a-head of her began frequently to fire single guns, in order to ascertain whether she was within range, when a shot having passed through the main-gallant sail of the Victory, a tremendous fire was opened upon her. The coolness that was preserved by his crew, was noticed with much satisfaction by Lord Nelson, and he declared, that in all his battles he had seen nothing that could surpass it. The Victory had lost about twenty men killed, and thirty wounded, before she returned a shot: her mizen-top-mast, and all her studding sails, and their booms on both sides, had been shot away, when, at four minutes past twelve she opened her larboard guns on the enemy's van. Captain Hardy soon afterwards informed the Admiral that it would be impossible to break through the enemy's line without running on board one of their ships, and begged to know which he would prefer.—"Take your choice, Hardy," replied he, "it does not much signify which." The tiller ropes of the Victory being afterwards shot away, she ran on board the Redoubtable, which coming along side, fired a broadside into the Victory, and immediately let down her lower-deck ports; which was done to prevent her being boarded through them by the Victory's crew; nor were they again opened. A few minutes after this, the Temeraire fell likewise on board of the Redoubtable, on the side opposite to the Victory, having also an enemy's ship on board of her on her other side: so that the extraordinary and unprecedented circumstance occurred here, of four ships of the line being on board each other in the heat of battle, forming as compact a tier as if they had been moored together, their heads all lying the the same way. The Victory then passing a-stern of the Bucentaure, hauled upon her starboard side, and pouring in a dreadful broadside, stood for the Admiral's old opponent, the Santissima Trinadada, playing her larboard guns on both ships, whilst the starboard guns of the middle and lower decks were depressed, and fired with a diminished charge of powder and three shot each, into the Redoubtable. This mode of firing was adopted by Lieutenants Williams, King, Yule, and Browne, to obviate the danger of the Temeraire's suffering from the Victory's shot passing through the Redoubtable, which must have been the case, if the usual quantity of powder, and the common elevation had been given to the guns. A circumstance occurred in this situation, which shewed in a most striking manner the cool intrepidity of the officers and men stationed on the lower deck of the Victory. When the guns on that deck were run out, their muzzles came in contact with the Redoubtable's side, and at every discharge there was reason to fear that the enemy's ship would take fire, and both the Victory and the Temeraire be involved in her flames. The fire-man of each gun stood ready with a bucket full of water, which, as soon as the gun was discharged, he dashed into the French ship through the holes made in her side by the shot.

Owing to the judicious mode which Lord Nelson had adopted, his fast sailing ships, like sharp-shooters in an army, had half gained the battle before the slow sailing ones came up to their support, which, as a corps of reserve, soon determined the day. What the genius of Nelson so ably planned, the British fleet fully executed. The superiority of their seamen was very manifest throughout the action; for the enemy's fleet, by keeping with the wind nearly on their beam, lay in a trough in the sea, and rolled considerably, so that one broadside passed over, and the next fell short of their opponents. In the first heat of the action, Mr. Scott, the Admiral's secretary, was killed by a cannon ball, while in conversation with Captain Hardy, and near to Lord Nelson. Captain Adair, of the marines, who soon afterwards fell, endeavoured to remove the mangled body, but not till it had attracted the notice of the Admiral, who very feelingly said, "Is that poor Scott who is gone?" In a few minutes a shot struck the fore-brace lists on the quarter-deck, and passing between Lord Nelson and Captain Hardy, drove off some splinters, which bruised the Captain's foot. They looked at each other, when Nelson, whom no danger could affect, smiled, and said, "This is too warm work, Hardy, to last."

The Redoubtable had for some time commenced a heavy fire of musquetry from her tops, which, like those of the enemy's other ships, were filled with riflemen. At fifteen minutes past one, and a quarter of an hour before the Redoubtable struck, Lord Nelson, and Captain Hardy, were observed to be walking near the middle of the quarter-deck: the Admiral had just commended the manner in which one of his ships near him was fought: Captain Hardy advanced from him to give some directions; and his Lordship was in the act of turning, near the hatch-way, with his face towards the stern, when a musquet ball struck him on the left shoulder, and entering through the epaulette, passed through the spine, and lodged in the muscles of the back, towards the right side. Nelson instantly fell with his face on the deck, in the very place that was covered with the blood of his secretary. Captain Hardy turning round, saw the serjeant of marines, Secker, with two seamen, raising him from the deck: "Hardy," said his Lordship, "I believe they have done it at last, my back bone is shot through." Some of the crew immediately bore the Admiral to the cockpit, and several wounded officers, and about forty men, were carried below at the same time. He was met at the foot of the cockpit ladder by Mr. Burke, the purser, who, with the assistance of a marine, conveyed him with some difficulty over the bodies of the wounded and dying men, and placed him on a pallet, in the midshipmen's birth, on the larboard side. Mr. Beatty was then called, and soon afterwards the Rev. Mr. Scott attended; and his Lorship's clothes were taken off, that the direction of the ball might be the better ascertained. "You can be of no use to me, Beatty," said Lord Nelson; "go and attend those whose lives can be preserved." As the blood flowed internally from the wound, the lower cavity of the body gradually filled; Lord Nelson therefore constantly desired Mr. Burke to raise him, and complaining of an excessive thirst, was supplied by the clergyman with lemonade. In this state of suffering, with nothing but havock, death, and misery around him, the spirit of Nelson remained unsubdued. His mind continued intent on the great object that was always before him—his duty to his country. Under the influence of this feeling, he anxiously enquired for Captain Hardy, to know whether the annihilation of the enemy might be depended on; but it was upwards of an hour before that officer could, at this momentous crisis, leave the deck, and Lord Nelson became apprehensive that his brave associate was dead. The crew of the Victory were now heard to cheer, and he anxiously demanded the cause, when Lieutenant Pasco, who lay wounded near him, said, that one of the enemy's ships had struck; a gleam of joy lighted up the countenance of the dying hero, and as the crew repeated their cheers, and marked the progress of the victory, his satisfaction visibly increased. When Captain Hardy came down from the deck, Lord Nelson anxiously said, "How goes the day with us, Hardy?" "Ten ships, my Lord, have struck." "But none of ours, I hope." "There is no fear, my dear Lord, of that. Five of their van have tacked, and shown an intention of bearing down upon us; but I have called some of our fresh ships round the Victory, and have no doubt of your complete success." Having said this, Captain Hardy found himself unable any longer to support the yearnings of a brave and affectionate heart, and withdrew from the cabin. Some time afterwards, Lord Nelson was again visited by the surgeon. "I find," said he, "something rising in my breast, which tells me I shall soon be gone. God be praised that I have done my duty. My pain is so severe that I devoutly wish to be released." When the firing from the Victory had in some measure ceased, and the glorious result of the day was accomplished, Captain Hardy immediately visited the dying chief, and reported that fourteen or fifteen of the enemy's vessels had struck. "God be praised, Hardy," said he, "bring the fleet to an anchor." Captain Hardy was again returning to the deck, when the Admiral called him back to deliver his last injunctions, and desired that his body might be carried home, and to be buried with the remains of his father and mother. He then took Captain Hardy by the hand, and observing, that he would most probably not see him again alive, he took a last and affectionate farewell of his bosom friend. His voice, then, gradually became inarticulate, with an evident increase of pain, when after a feeble struggle, these last words were distinctly heard—"I have done my duty, I praise God for it." Having said this, he turned his face to Mr. Burke, on whose arm he had been supported, and expired without a groan. Such was the end of this great man, whose career had been eminently useful and brilliant, and whose fate was glorious and triumphant.* When his Lordship was seen to fall, the crew of the Santissima

* Horatio Nelson was the fourth son of the Rev. Edward Nelson. He was born on the 29th of September, 1758, at Burnham Thorpe, Norfolk, of which place his father was rector. He began his education at Norwich school, was afterwards removed to North Waltham, and at the age of twelve, he entered on board the Raisonable, of 64 guns, under his maternal uncle Captain Maurice Suckling. He rose to the rank of Lieutenant in April 1777, and was immediately employed as second of the Lowestoffe, of 32 guns, on the Jamaica station. In June, 1779, he obtained, under Admiral Sir Peter Parker, the appointment of Post Captain, and the command of the Hinchinbroke; and when an attack was expected on Jamaica from the French forces under D'Estaing, he was entrusted with the care of the batteries of Port Royal, and the defence of Kingston and Spanish Town. In the attack made in 1780, upon Fort Juan, in the gulf of Mexico, his perseverance

DEATH OF LORD NELSON.

NAVAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

Santissima Trinadada testified their joy by a shout of triumph. Their exultation was short; for they were compelled to strike to British valour.

The Victory finished her honourable course with the capture of a third ship. In the mean time Admiral Collingwood had closely engaged the rear of the enemy; and contributed in no slight degree to the renown of the British flag.* Success was no longer doubtful; by three in the afternoon, the line of the combined forces had given way, and many of their ships were either destroyed or taken. It is but justice to add, that both the French and the Spaniards fought gallantly. Several of the English ships were assailed by two antagonists at a time. Among these, the Temeraire was boarded on one side by the Spaniards, and on the other by the French. The double swarm poured in multitudes on the quarter-deck, rushed to the flag staff, tore down the colours, and hoisted their own. The spirit of Britons was roused by this daring exploit. The crew of the Temeraire, after an animated struggle, cleared the decks of the enemy, dashed away the hostile ensigns, and again elevated the proud standard of naval sovereignty with loud huzzas. Captains Fremantle, Conn, Harwood, and the Earl of Northesk, particularly distinguished themselves in this celebrated battle; and indeed every officer and seaman of the fleet in his performance exceeded the orders of the commander-in-chief, conveyed in the ever memorable signal—England expects every man to do his duty. Before the battle began, Lord Nelson entertained a presentiment that this would be the last day of his life, and seemed to look for death with almost as sure an expectation as for victory. But although this gloomy foreboding occupied his mind, and though he had more than once observed, that the enemy would endeavour to mark him out as one of their victims; yet his Lordship, on the morning of the 21st, put on the stars of the different orders with which he had been invested. His secretary and chaplain, apprehensive that these insignia might expose his person to unnecessary danger, endeavoured, but in vain, to prevail upon him to take them off. To all their entreaties, he replied—"In honour I gained them, and in honour I will die with them."

The Spanish Admiral Gravina, with ten sail, joined by the frigates to leeward, made for Cadiz. The five leading ships of the enemy's van tacked, and standing to the south, to windward of the British, were engaged and the sternmost taken. The others escaped, leaving to his Majesty's fleet nineteen ships of the line, of which two were first rates, the Santissima Trinidada, and the Santa Anna, with the three flag officers. These were Admiral Villeneuve; Don Ignatio Maria d'Aliva, Vice-Admiral; and the Spanish Rear-Admiral Don Baltazar Hidalgo Cisneros. General Conta-perseverance was of infinite benefit to the public service. Here the unfortunate Colonel, then Captain Despard, gallantly supported him in the attack, and after storming the battery, they fought and defeated the Spaniards with their own guns. The next ship which he commanded was the Janus, of 44 guns, and soon after he was removed to the Albermarle, and continued on the American station with Sir Samuel Hood till the peace. In 1783 he visited France, and the next year he was appointed to the Boreas of 28 guns, at the Leeward islands, and during his continuance on this station he married (March 1787,) Frances Herbert Nisbit, widow of Dr. Nisbit, of Nevis, and daughter of W. Herbert, Esq. senior judge of that island, then only in her nineteenth year. He returned to England (Nov. 1787) and retired to Burnham Thorpe, in the bosom of domestic happiness, till 1793, when he obtained the command of the Agamemnon, of 64 guns, and joined Lord Hood in the Mediterranean, where he assisted at the taking of Toulon, and at the siege of Bastia, in which he superintended the disembarkation of the troops, and ably commanded the batteries. He afterwards had a gallant encounter with five French ships of war, and then supported the siege of Calvi, where he lost the sight of his right eye, in consequence of some particles of sand being violently driven against it by one of the shots of the enemy's batteries. Under the next commander, Lord Hotham, he continued to distinguish himself, particularly in the engagements with the French fleet, on the 15th of March, in July, 1795, and in the blockade of Genoa. When Admiral Jervis succeeded in the Mediterranean command, Captain Nelson removed from the Agamemnon to the Captain, of 74 guns, soon after obtained a commodore's pendant, and was employed in the blockade of Leghorn, and the taking of Porto Ferrajo. On his passage to Gibraltar, in the Minerva frigate, he fell in with two Spanish frigates, one of which, the Sabine, of 40 guns, he took, and sailing immediately to join Admiral Jervis, he was pursued by two ships of the Spanish fleet, a circumstance which was quickly communicated to the commander-in-chief, and in a few hours produced a general action. In this memorable fight, on the 14th of February, 1797, in which fifteen English ships defeated a Spanish fleet of twenty-seven ships, and took four three deckers, the commodore behaved with his usual gallantry. In the Captain, to which he had shifted his flag, he attacked the Santissima Trinadada, of 140 guns, and passing to the St. Nicholas, of 80 guns, and then to the San Joseph, of 112 guns, he had the happiness to see both these ships strike. For his gallant conduct on this occasion, he was created Knight of the Bath, and in April 1797, he was made Rear-Admiral of the Blue, and appointed to the command of the inner squadron in the blockade of Cadiz. After making some vigourous, but unsuccessful attacks on the town, he was sent by Lord St. Vincent, to take the town of Santa Cruz, in the island of Teneriffe, but though he obtained possession of the place for seven hours, he was unable to reduce the citadel, and was permitted to retire unmolested to his fleet. During this desperate attack he lost his right arm, which was shattered by a shot, but his life was preserved by the attention of his son-in-law, Captain Nisbit, who, during the darkness of the night, missed him from his side, and returning, found him exhausted on the ground, and carried him safe on his back to the shore, where a boat conveyed him to his ship. In consequence of his wound, Sir Horatio received a pension of 1000*l.* and in the memorial which, according to custom, he presented to his Majesty on the occasion, he declared that in the glorious services in which he had been employed, he had been engaged with the enemy upwards of one hundred and twenty times.(a) Amongst other marks of public favour, he received the freedom of the city of London in a gold box, worth one hundred guineas. He soon after joined, in the Vanguard, Lord St. Vincent, and was sent up the Mediterranean to watch the motions of the French ships, which were ready to convey Buonaparte to the invasion of Egypt. Notwithstanding his vigilance, the fleet escaped, but he sailed in its pursuit, and after returning from the Egyptian shores to Sicily, almost in despair, he again hastened to the mouth of the Nile, and to the general joy of his fleet, descried the enemy moored in the bay of Aboukir. Here he obtained one of the most splendid and important naval victories recorded in history, and as a reward for his services was created a Baron, by the title of Nelson of the Nile. On his return to Naples, he removed the royal family from the violent popular commotions which seemed to threaten their safety, and even their lives, and in July 1799, in consequence of the success of the Russian arms in Italy, he had the satisfaction to convey them back from Palermo to their capital, and to replace the monarch on his throne. On his return home he was received with enthusiastic joy by every rank of society. He had, indeed, every earthly blessing except domestic happiness; that he had forfeited for ever. Before he had been three months in England he separated from Lady Nelson. This was the consequence of his infatuated attachment to Lady Hamilton, the widow of Sir William Hamilton, who, next to his country, occupied his thoughts, and absorbed his affections even in the hour of death. Lord Nelson was soon after called away to break that confederacy which the capricious politics of the Emperor of Russia had formed with Denmark and Sweden against this country; and, for his services on that occasion, he was created a Viscount, and his honours made hereditary in his family. On the re-commencement of hostilities, in 1803, he was summoned from his retreat at Merton, to take the command of the fleet in the Mediterranean. His last glorious services have been just described. The remains of the hero of Trafalgar, were brought in his own ship, the Victory, to the mouth of the Thames, and conveyed to Greenwich, and on the 6th of the following January, they were deposited in St. Paul's Cathedral, with all the pomp and solemnity, the tributes of regret and of affection, which a grateful nation could pay to a departed conqueror. His brother, the heir of his honours, was raised to the dignity of an earldom, with a grant of 6000*l.* a year, 10,000*l.* each was voted to his two sisters, and 100,000*l.* for the purchase of an estate to perpetuate the memory of the conqueror, and the gratitude of England.

(a) The following memorial is a document too curious to be omitted:—"To the King's most excellent Majesty, the memorial of Sir Horatio Nelson, K. B. and a Rear-Admiral in your Majesty's fleet, sheweth, that during the present war, your memorialist has been in four actions with the fleets of the enemy, namely, on the 13th and 14th of March, 1795, on the 13th of July, 1795, and the 14th of February, 1797, in three actions with frigates, in six engagements against batteries, in ten actions in boats employed in cutting out of harbours, in destroying vessels, and in taking three towns. Your memorialist has also served on shore with the army four months, and commanded the batteries at the siege of Bastia and Calvi. That during the war he has assisted at the capture of seven sail of the line, six frigates, four corvettes, and eleven privateers of different sizes, and taken and destroyed nearly fifty sail of merchant vessels, and your memorialist has actually been engaged against the enemy upwards of one hundred and twenty times. In which service your memorialist has lost his right eye and arm, and been severely wounded, and bruised in his body. All of which services and wounds your memorialist most humbly submits to your Majesty's most gracious consideration.

October 1797. (Signed) "NELSON."

* Captain Duff, of the Mars; and Captain Cooke, of the Bellerophon, both fell in the service of their country on this memorable occasion.

min, the commander of the troops embarked, was also taken in the Bucentaure. By some mismanagement of the crew, the Achille, a French seventy-four, after her surrender took fire and blew up; but two hundred of her men were saved by the tenders. The Spanish Vice-Admiral d'Aliva died of his wounds; but Admiral Villeneuve was sent to England, and afterwards permitted to return to France, where, as the French government assert, he destroyed himself, dreading the consequences of a court-martial. It is generally believed, however, that he was assassinated, by the orders of Buonaparte.

The total British loss, on this occasion, amounted to 423 killed, and 1,064 wounded. Twenty of the enemy's vessels struck; but a gale of wind coming on from the south-west, fifteen of the prizes went down, one effected its escape into Cadiz, and four only were saved. The wounded Spaniards were sent on shore, on an assurance that they would not serve again till regularly exchanged; and the Spaniards, with a generous feeling, which would not, perhaps, have been found in any other people, offered the use of their hospitals for the wounded British seamen, pledging the honour of Spain, that they should there receive all possible care and attention.

The thanks of both Houses of Parliament were conferred upon the officers, seamen, and marines of the fleet; gold medals were awarded to those who had particularly distinguished themselves on this memorable day; and in addition to the honours and rewards showered down upon the family of the fallen hero, the dignity of Baron of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with an annuity of 2,000*l.* a year, to himself and his two next heirs, was conferred upon Vice-Admiral Collingwood, by the style and title of Baron Collingwood of Caldburne and Hethpoole, in the county of Northumberland.

The four French ships under Rear-Admiral Dumanoir, which escaped to the southward towards the close of the action of Trafalgar, after a short respite shared the fate of their companions. On the night of the 2d of November, Rear-Admiral Sir Richard Strachan, cruising off Ferrol, with four ships of the line and three frigates, fell in with what he thought the Rochefort squadron, but they proved to be the fugitives from the combined fleet, to which he immediately gave chase. A little before noon on the 4th, Dumanoir, finding an engagement unavoidable, came to close action; and after a well supported contest, continued for nearly three hours and a half, all the four ships struck to the English, but not till they had become quite unmanageable. These ships proved to be the Formidable, of 80 guns, and the Mont Blanc, Scipion, and Duguay Trouin, of 74 guns each, on board of all of which the slaughter had been very great, but the loss on board the English ships amounted only to 24 killed, and 111 wounded. Thus was the naval power of France and her ally reduced to insignificance. The phantoms of "ships, colonies, and commerce," which had floated before the imagination of Buonaparte, were chased from the regions of probability, and Britain was confirmed in her paramount dominion of the seas.

A. D. 1806.] Parliament met on the 21st day of January; and as the state of his Majesty's sight did not permit him to deliver his speech from the throne, that assembly was opened by commission. The Lord Chancellor read the speech from the throne. Its principal topics were congratulations on the splendour of our late naval successes, mixed with suitable expressions of regret for the lamented death of the hero by whom they were achieved. His Majesty next informed Parliament that he had directed the treaties concluded with foreign powers to be laid before them; and while he lamented the late disastrous events on the continent, he congratulated the two Houses of Parliament, on the assurances which he continued to receive from the Emperor of Russia, of that monarch's determination to adhere to his alliance with Britain. He next signified to the House that he had directed the sum of one million sterling, accruing to the crown from the droits of Admiralty, to be applied to the public service of the year; and concluded by recommending vigilance and exertion against the enemy, as by such means alone the present contest could be brought to a happy consummation.

The address was moved in the House of Lords by the Earl of Essex, seconded by Lord Carleton; and in the House of Commons by Lord Francis Spencer, seconded by Mr. Ainslie. An amendment to the address was read in the Peers by Earl Cowper, and in the Commons by Lord Henry Petty, but on account of the dangerous indisposition of Mr. Pitt, who was at that moment on his death-bed, the amendment was not in either House proposed as a motion. Mr. Pitt, it appeared, had left Bath on the 10th of January, and on his arrival in the neighbourhood of London, on the day following, had taken up his residence at his own house, on Putney Heath. His health had been for some time in the most alarming state. He was emaciated in the extreme, reduced to the greatest possible debility, and as the functions of his stomach no longer performed their office, little hope was entertained of the re-establishment of his health. In this deplorable situation, symptoms of typhus supervened; his pulse rose to one hundred and thirty; and he was occasionally delirious, but in general drowsy and lethargic.

A constitution so exhausted by previous disease, sunk rapidly, and at a quarter past four o'clock on the morning of the 23d of January, he expired.* His death, at so critical a juncture, was considered as a virtual

* Of the life of this great and distinguished statesman, who forms so conspicuous a figure in our history, the following brief sketch may be acceptable:—The Right Hon. William Pitt, second son of William, Earl of Chatham, was born at Hayes, the 28th of May, 1759. From his earliest years he was instructed by his father, who foresaw the future elevation of his son, and taught him to argue with logical precision, and to speak with elegance, correctness, and force. He was afterwards under the tuition of the Rev. Mr. Wilson, and at the proper age he was admitted member of Pembroke hall, Cambridge, where he had for his tutors Dr. Turner, since Dean of Norwich, and Dr. Prettyman, now Dr. Tomline, Bishop of Lincoln. Under the guidance of these able men, he rapidly matured his knowledge of classical literature, and of mathematics, and he left the university with the degree of M. A. and a high character for application, for abilities, and for correctness and propriety of deportment. He next entered as student at Lincoln's Inn, was called to the bar, and afterwards went once or twice on the western circuit, where he was occasionally employed as junior counsel. At the general election, in 1780, he was proposed as member for Cambridge University, but few seconded his pretensions, and on the 23d of January, in the following year, he obtained a seat for Appleby, on the interest of Sir J. Lowther. He enlisted on the side of opposition against Lord North and the American war; and his first speech, which was in support of Mr. Burke's bill for economical reform, displayed that commanding eloquence which many of the members had before so warmly applauded in his illustrious father. In the early part of his political career, he was an able and strenuous advocate for parliamentary reform; and the first motion which he ever submitted to the House of Commons, was for a more equal representation of the people in Parliament, by the addition of at least one hundred members, consisting of knights of the shire and representatives of the metropolis. This was a subject that deeply interested the young patriot; and at the meetings to promote a reform in the Commons house of Parliament, held at the Thatched House Tavern, Mr. Pitt sat as a delegate. On the death of the Marquis of Rockingham, he accepted, at the age of 22, the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer; and under the administration of which he formed a part, the American war was concluded. Though he ably defended the conduct of his colleagues, the terms of peace were regarded by the majority of the nation as unpopular, and the ministry was dissolved. Restored to privacy, Mr. Pitt passed some months on the continent; and after visiting Italy, and several of the German courts, he returned to England, and on the dismissal of the coalition administration of Mr. Fox and Lord North, he was selected for the arduous office of first Lord of the Treasury, and Chancellor of the Exchequer, 18th of December, 1783. Thus seated at the head of affairs, he bent the great powers of his mind to the framing of a bill for the regulation of Indian affairs, which might be more palatable to the nation, and less objectionable than that of Mr. Fox. His attempts, however, were at first unavailing, as his predecessors, though dismissed from office, still retained their influence in the Commons; and in consequence of this struggle between the House and the King's prerogative, an appeal was made to the sense of the nation in a new Parliament, which not only approved of his India bill, but adopted his financial system for the reduction of the national debt by a sinking fund, and cemented the commercial treaty, which, under his auspices, had been concluded with France, on a basis advantageous to the interests and the prosperity of England. During the unfortunate illness with which the King virtual dissolution of the existing administration. His colleagues were men of little comparative weight or consideration in the country; and besides the want of public confidence in these ministers, they were disunited and without a head. No sooner had the death of their patron dissolved the only tie that united them, than symptoms of disunion and disagreement began to appear in their ranks; and it contributed not a little to the dispersion of the party, that while many competitors presented themselves for the place of leader, there was no person of their number so pre-eminent for his station or abilities, as to be raised by general consent to that distinguished situation. In circumstances so discouraging, it is not wonderful, that the surviving members of Mr. Pitt's administration resigned to their opponents the reins of government without a struggle, and even refused to retain charge of them, when urged to that duty by the solicitations of the court.

Every attempt to form an administration from the wreck of the late ministry proving unsuccessful, his Majesty was advised to call in the assistance of Lord Grenville; and a message was accordingly conveyed to his Lordship, on the 26th of January, desiring his attendance at Buckingham house. Lord Grenville, having obeyed the summons, was honoured with three separate audiences of the King; and on the 3d of February, the new ministerial arrangements were finally settled; embracing the leading members of the three parties designated by the appellation of the old and new opposition, and the Sidmouth party, as appears in the note below.*

Lord Grenville's holding the office of auditor of the Exchequer, which is incompatible with that of first Lord of the Treasury, rendered it necessary to bring a bill into Parliament, to enable him to accept the latter office, without forfeiting the former; and, to palliate the objections that might be made to this equivocal union, Lord Grenville was impowered to name a trustee to hold the office of auditor, so long as his Lordship should continue in the situation of first Lord of the Treasury; which trustee should be responsible to the auditor for the salary, and to the public for the due execution of his office. The appointment of Lord Ellenborough to a seat in the Cabinet, was a measure of still more doubtful policy. This was brought before Parliament, by the Earl of Bristol, in the Lords, and by Mr. Spencer Stanhope, in the Commons. On the 3d of March, the noble Earl moved a resolution, stating it to be the opinion of that House, "That it was highly inexpedient, and tended to weaken the administration of justice, to summon to any committee, or assembly of the Privy Council, any of the judges of his Majesty's courts of common law." This motion was negatived without a division. On the same day, a similar resolution was moved in the Commons, and lost, in favour of the previous question, by 222 against 64.

On the 3d of April, Mr. Windham introduced the subject of his new military arrangements to the consideration of the House of Commons. It encountered the most determined opposition, in every stage of its progress; but its essential points were carried, and passed into a law.†

In finance, ministers appeared satisfied with following

King was afflicted in 1788, Mr. Pitt successfully resisted the right of the Prince of Wales to assume the reins of government, which Mr. Fox as warmly maintained. From this period, his conduct must be fresh in the recollection of the reader. Three days before the death of Mr. Pitt, the Bishop of Lincoln, who never left him during his illness, after informing him that it was the opinion of his physicians, that his life was in the most imminent danger, and that probably he had not many hours to live, requested to administer to him the consolations of religion. "I fear," said Mr. Pitt, "I have, like too many other men, neglected prayer too much to have any ground for hope, that it can be efficacious on a death-bed—" but,"—rising as he spoke, and clasping his hands with the utmost fervency and devotion, "I throw myself entirely" (the last word being pronounced with a strong emphasis) "upon the mercy of God, through the merits of Christ?" The Bishop then read the prayers to him, and he seemed to join in them with calm and humble piety. On the anniversary of that day on which, five and-twenty years before, he had become a member of the British senate, he breathed his last without a struggle, and without pain. On a motion of the Hon. Henry Lascelles, made in the House of Commons, on the 27th of January, and carried by a majority of 258 to 89 voices, his remains were buried at the public expence, in Westminster Abbey, by the side of his father, with becoming funeral pomp, the herald pronouncing after the corpse had descended into the tomb, the emphatical words:—non sibi sed patriæ vixit.—he lived not for himself, but for his country. This truly great man possessed no particular advantages of person or physiognomy; the former being deficient in grace, the latter by no means attractive. As a speaker he was thought to be without a rival: such was the happy choice of his words, the judicious arrangement of his subject, and the fascinating effect of a perennial eloquence, that his wonderful powers were acknowledged even by those who happened to be prepossessed against his arguments. His integrity was unimpeached; and so far was he from making use of his opportunities to acquire personal wealth, that he died insolvent. With a manner somewhat reserved and distant, in what might be termed his public deportment, no man was ever better qualified to gain, or more successful in fixing the attachment of his friends. In the society of his intimate friends, he was distinguished for a kindness of heart, a gentleness of demeanour, and a playfulness of good humour, which no one ever witnessed without interest, or participated without delight. Modesty was a striking feature in his character; and in his conduct he was rigidly just, and strictly moral. His enemies charge him with the crime of ambition; but his friends regard him as the disinterested patriot—the political saviour of his country.

The Duke of Bedford went as Lord-Lieutenant to Ireland, accompanied by the Right Honourable William Elliot, as his chief secretary. Mr. George Ponsonby was appointed Chancellor and Keeper of the Seals in Ireland, and Sir John Newport, Chancellor of the Irish Exchequer.

† The great change which he proposed to introduce into the army was in the terms of its engagement. Instead of an engagement to serve for life, he proposed that the soldiers in future should be enlisted to serve for a term of years only. The term of military service should be divided into three periods, of seven years each for the infantry, and for the cavalry and artillery, the first period to be ten, the second, six, and the third, five years. At the end of every period the soldier should have a right to claim his discharge. If he left the army at the end of the first period, he should be entitled to exercise his trade and calling in any part of Great Britain or Ireland; if at the end of the second period, he should be entitled, besides, to a pension for life; and at the end of the third period, after a service of twenty-one years, he should be discharged from the army, with the full allowance of Chelsea, which might be raised to a shilling a day. If he was wounded or disabled in the service, he should receive the same pension as if he had served out the whole term. During the second period he should also receive sixpence a week of additional pay, and during the third period, a shilling a week. Desertion might be punished by the loss of so many years service, and though corporal punishments could not be banished entirely from the army, they might be diminished both in number and severity. With respect to the volunteers, his opinion was, that there ought to be no corps of that description, except those formed of persons in the better ranks of life, who would serve at their own expence, with no other allowance from government but arms, and no other exemption but from service in other sorts of irregular force, which it might be advisable to constitute. The total amount of the reductions which he proposed in this establishment, would produce an annual saving of more than 800,000*l*. The peasantry, artisans, &c. he wished to see, not locked up in volunteer corps, and vainly employed in adopting the dress, and imitating the evolutions of troops of the line, but loosely trained under officers of the militia, or regular army, so that they might be qualified, under their direction, to act as an armed peasantry, and harass and impede the motions of the enemy, if he should ever accomplish a landing in this country, or be prepared at least to take their place in the regular army, and repair whatever losses it might sustain lowing the system, and executing the plans of their predecessors.*

The attention of Parliament was directed to the correction of a series of abuses connected with the revenue department of the state. The African Slave Trade also fell under discussion; and the Attorney-General, with the concurrence of the cabinet, brought a bill into Parliament, which passed both Houses without any formidable opposition, and afterwards received the royal assent. This bill prohibited the exportation of slaves from the British colonies after the 1st of January, 1807, and prohibited all subjects of this country, residing either at home or in our foreign settlements, from being in any way concerned in, or accessary to the supply of foreign countries with slaves after that period. Another bill was soon after brought into Parliament, which passed without opposition, for the purpose of preventing the increase of the British slave trade in all its branches.† The next measure brought forward upon this subject was the following resolution moved by Mr. Fox in the House of Commons, on the 10th of June, and with which that great statesman closed his Parliamentary career:—"That this House conceiving the African slave trade to be contrary to the principles of justice, humanity, and sound policy, will, with all possible expedition, proceed to take effectual measures for abolishing the said trade, in such manner, and at such period, as they may deem advisable." The motion was opposed by General Tarleton, Mr. Gascoyne, Lord Castlereagh, Sir William Young, Mr. George Rose, and Mr. Manning; and supported by Sir Ralph Milbanke, Mr. Francis, Sir Samuel Romilly, the Solicitor-General, Mr. Wilberforce, Lord Henry Petty, Mr. Barham, Sir John Newport, Mr. Canning, Mr. William Smith, and Mr. Windham. On a division of the House, there appeared for Mr. Fox's motion 114, against it 15, leaving a majority in favour of the abolition of 99 voices. The resolution was then sent up to the Lords, and a conference demanded; after which, the Lords adopted the same resolution on the motion of Lord Grenville, by 41 against 20. The last step taken on this subject, during the present session, was a joint address from the two Houses of Parliament to the King, "beseeching his Majesty to take such measures as might appear most effectual for obtaining, by negociation, the concurrence and concert of foreign powers in the abolition of the slave trade, and the execution of the regulations adopted for that purpose."

The trial of Lord Viscount Melville next engaged the attention of Parliament. The House of Commons, after a minute inquiry into the expenditure of the public money, had deliberately resolved to engage in the most solemn and important part of its functions—the exercise of its power of impeachment against this nobleman. Managers were accordingly appointed by the House;‡ Westminster Hall was fitted up in a style worthy of the solemnity; and, on Monday, the 29th of April, the court was opened with the usual forms and solemnities.§ In reply to the respective charges, the averment of Lord Melville stated, "That he was not guilty in action. This training he meant to be compulsory, but it should last only for four and twenty days in each year. The persons so trained should have no particular dress, nor be carried to a distance from their homes. For the days they were engaged in training, the same allowance should be paid to them as to the volunteers. As it would be impossible to train the whole population of the country at once, the persons liable to that duty might be limited to 200,000 men annually; and of these the government should select for actual training the proportion which it judged to be most expedient.

* On the 28th of March, Lord Henry Petty, the new Chancellor of the Exchequer, opened the budget, in a speech remarkable for the perspicuity of its statements, and the clearness of its arrangement. After submitting to the House a variety of details, his Lordship proceeded to state, that the beneficial effects of raising the supplies within the year were strongly exemplified by the fact, that during the last war, the average increase of the national debt had been at the rate of 25,000,000*l.* a year, while the average annual increase in the present war, was at the rate of only 12,000,000*l.* a difference to be attributed solely to the system of war taxes, which had not been introduced in the last war till near its close. Last year, the war taxes had been estimated at 14,500,000*l.* and they had actually produced more than 13,000,000*l.* In the current year, it was intended to raise them to 19,500,000*l.* of which 5,000,000*l.* were to be raised by making the property tax more productive, and 1,000,000*l.* additional from the excise and customs. The proposition he should submit to the House with respect to the property tax, was, to raise that impost from six and a half to ten per cent. and to do away the principal part of the present exemptions. As to the quantum of income to be made liable to the tax, it was proposed that ten per cent. should be paid on all property above fifty pounds a year, but that a scale of abatements should be introduced in favour of small tradesmen, and small annuitants, whose income was less than 100*l.* a year. With respect to the war duties on the customs, it was proposed to raise those duties, with certain modifications from one-fourth to one third, by which 1,000,000*l.* a year would be produced. And in order to cover the interest of the loan, the duty on wine was to be made permanent, and applied to that purpose; a duty of forty shillings per ton was to be imposed on pig-iron; the duty on tea was to be equalized; and a tax on appraisements imposed, by the whole of which taxes it was estimated that a sum of 1,136,000*l.* would be produced annually. The noble Lord concluded his speech by expressing his determination, and that of his colleagues, to administer the government with economy, and to reform all abuses wherever they could be detected. The property tax bill encountered great opposition, not so much from the late ministers, as from independent members of Parliament, who disliked the harshness and rigour of the proposed enactments, and disapproved of such an enormous addition to the present heavy burthens of the people. Several modifications of the tax were accordingly proposed, to some of which the ministers acceded, but the greater part of them were rejected on account of their tendency to diminish the product, and impair the efficacy of the measure. The proposed tax on iron was abandoned; and in lieu of it a tax was proposed on private brewers; but this obnoxious impost was at length withdrawn, and the interest of the loan was provided for by an additional ten per cent. to the assessed taxes. In consideration of the severe pressure of taxes on persons who had large families, a bill was passed, granting to parents an allowance of four per centum out of their assessed taxes for each of their children above two, maintained at their own expense, provided the total amount of their assessment was under forty pounds a year.

† By the provisions of this bill, all British vessels were prohibited under severe penalties from engaging in the African slave trade, which had not been actually employed in that traffic before the 1st of August, 1806, or contracted for, to be employed in it before the 10th of June in that year. This act was limited in its duration to the term of two years after the conclusion of the session of Parliament then sitting: but long before the expiration of that period, every provision for the limitation, or regulation of this traffic was rendered unnecessary by the total and formal abolition of the slave trade.

§ A master in the chancery read aloud the articles of impeachment against Lord Melville, of which the following is the substance:—

1st. That Lord Melville, while Treasurer of the Navy, did, previously to the 10th of January, 1786, take and receive out of the money intrusted to him from his Majesty's Exchequer, the sum of 10,000*l.* and fraudulently and illegally convert the same to his own use, or to some other corrupt and illegal purposes; and on the 11th of June, 1805, in the House of Commons, did refuse to account for the application of the said sum;

2nd. That, after the passing of the act of Parliament in the 25th year of his Majesty's reign, intituled "an act for better regulating the office of Treasurer of his Majessy's Navy," Lord Melville, contrary to the provisions of that act, did permit Alexander Trotter, his Paymaster, illegally to draw from the Bank of England, for other purposes than for immediate application to navy services, large sums of money, which had been issued to the Bank on account of Lord Melville, as Treasurer of the navy, and place the same in the hands of Thomas Coutts and Co. his private bankers, in his own name, and subject to his sole controul and disposition;

3rd. That not only did Lord Melville permit Trotter to place, as aforesaid, the public money in the hands of Thomas Coutts and Co. his private bankers, but to apply the same for purposes of private profit and emolument, whereby the same money was exposed to great risk of loss, and withdrawn from the controul and disposition of the treasurer of the navy;

4th. That part of the money so taken by Trotter from the bank, was, by permission of Lord Melville, placed in the hands of Mark Sprott and others, and applied for purposes of private profit and emolument;

5th. That Lord Melville himself did, after the 10th of January, 1786, take and receive from the public money issued to the Bank of England, the sum of 10,000*l.* and fraudulently and illegally convert the same to his own use, or to some other corrupt and illegal purposes;

6th. That Lord Melville received advances of large sums of money from Trotter, out of the public money so obtained by him and deposited in the hands of his private bankers, which advances were entered in an account current kept between Trotter and Lord Melville, and preserved till February, 1803, when, by mutual agreement dated the 18th and 23d of February of that year, it was destroyed, with all the vouchers and other memorandums relative thereto, for the purpose of fraudulently concealing these transactions;

7th. That, in particular, Lord Melville received from Trotter the sum of 22,000*l.* out of the public money, and that the accounts relative thereto have been burned and destroyed for the above mentioned purpose;

8th. That among other advances of money as aforesaid, Lord Melville received from Trotter the sum of 22,000*l.* for which he paid interest; guilty of all or any of the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and that he was prepared to prove the same before a tribunal composed of his Peers. The charges and answers having been concluded, Mr. Whitbread rose and addressed the court in an elaborate speech, which occupied upwards of three hours in the delivery, and which embraced the topics so successfully enforced in the House of Commons on the 8th of April, in the preceding year, when the tenth report of the Commissioners of Naval Inquiry was first brought under the consideration of that assembly. After counsel had been heard in defence, and after the managers had closed their reply, and the Lords had adjourned to the chamber of Parliament, some conversation took place in the House of Peers upon the day to be fixed for discussing the charges; and as the evidence, which was very voluminous, was not printed, it was agreed to postpone the further consideration of this business for ten days, and, accordingly, the further proceedings on the trial were deferred till Wednesday, the 28th of May, on which day the Lords were ordered to be summoned. In the Commons, a motion of thanks to the managers was made on the 23d of May, by General Fitzpatrick. This motion, which was seconded by Sir John Newport, was agreed to with only one dissentient voice. At the appointed period the members of the House of Peers assembled in their chamber of Parliament. The assistance of the Judges, on certain points of law, was resorted to, and after a variety of animated and protracted debates, their Lordships proceeded, on the 12th of June, to deliver their verdict. The Lord Chancellor, interrogating each Peer by name, put the question, "Is Henry Viscount Melville guilty or not guilty?" to which the answer of "guilty," or "not guilty," "upon my honour," was given by each member, placing at the same time his right hand upon his breast. The Lord Chancellor, after casting up the votes, addressed the defendant and said:—"Henry Viscount Melville, I am to acquaint your Lordship that you are acquitted of the articles of impeachment exhibited against you by the Commons, for high crimes and misdemeanours, and of all things contained therein." The Lords then adjourned to their chamber, when a correct copy of the verdict, as delivered by each Peer, was inscribed on their journals, as follows:

9th. That

From the moment of their entrance upon office, ministers appear to have formed the resolution of directing their views to the accomplishment of a peace with France. In February, a project for assassinating Buonaparte was communicated by a foreigner to Mr. Fox, who immediately sent a statement of the circumstances to M. Talleyrand. The French minister, in a respectful reply to to this letter, took occasion to introduce, unofficially, an extract from Buonaparte's speech to the legislative body, expressive of his wish for peace with England, and his readiness to negociate, without a moment's delay, agreeably to the treaty of Amiens. Mr. Fox considered this communication as a distinct overture, and proceeded to answer it in that frank and direct style which is the characteristic of all his public dispatches. He objected to the uncertainty of the basis of Amiens; the variety of modes in which it had been interpreted; and the delay, which the explanations on the meaning of it would unavoidably occasion, even if no other objection should exist. "The true basis of such a negociation, he observed, "between two great powers, equally despising every idea of chicane, would be the reciprocal recognition of the following principle; viz. that the object of both parties should be a peace, honourable for both, and for their respective allies; and at the same time, of a nature to secure, as far as in their power, the future tranquillity of Europe." He then proceeded to state the impossibility of treating, much less of concluding any treaty, unless in concert with Russia, but suggested the practicability of some previous discussion of the principal points, and some provisional arrangements, while they were waiting for the actual intervention of that power. A correspondence of some length ensued, in which, M. Talleyrand endeavoured to represent Russia as interposing its authority between two nations fully competent to adjust their own differences.

Mr. Fox, however, insisted on her being a party in question as an ally of Great Britain, whose interests were inseparably connected with her own. To bring the discussion to a point, he stated explicitly, that his Majesty was willing to negociate conjointly with Russia, but would not consent to negociate separately. To this proposal M. Talleyrand re-urged the former objections, and thus the correspondence closed.

Early in June, however, Lord Yarmouth, son of the Marquis of Hertford, who had been among the detained in France, arrived in London, and communicated the substance of a conversation with M. Talleyrand, which had passed at the desire of that minister, for the purpose of conveying, through a secret and confidential channel, the sentiments and views of France, and the outlines of the terms on which peace might be restored between the two countries. The terms sketched out in the conversation seemed so favourable, that the English cabinet lost no time in conveying to M. Talleyrand their disposition to commence a negociation on the basis contained in them. However, after much shuffling and evasion, on the part of the French government, the negociation terminated without success.*

Mr.

9th. That Trotter acted as agent to Lord Melville without any pecuniary compensation, and in that capacity was generally in advance for him to the amount of from 10,000*l.* to 20,000*l.* out of the public money in his hands; that Lord Melville was aware, that Trotter had no means of making him such advances, except from the public money of which he had illegally possessed himself; and that Trotter was induced to act gratuitously as Lord Melville's agent, and to make these advances, in consideration of Lord Melville's connivance at his free use and uncontrolled application of the public money to his own private profit and emolument;

10th. That Lord Melville, between August 19th, 1782, and January 1st, 1806, did take and receive from the monies issued to him out of his Majesty's exchequer, as Treasurer of the navy, divers large sums of money, amounting to 27,000*l.* or thereabouts, and fraudulently and illegally convert the same to his own use, or some other corrupt and illegal purposes.

* Three specific offers were held out as inducements to Great Britain to treat: viz. the restoration of Hanover, the possession of Sicily, as a consequence of the principle of the uti possidetis—the state of actual possession—and a facility in the arrangement of the form of treating, which, without establishing a Congress, or recognizing the claim of a joint negociation, would not impair the advantages which Great Britain and Russia might derive from their close connection and alliance. M. Talleyrand, in the first interview with Lord Yarmouth, after his return to Paris, not only departed entirely from his clear and explicit offer of Sicily, but indulged himself in vain allusions to further demands, and in peremptory representations of the necessity of negociating with some persons duly authorised and impowered to treat. This first deviation from the original overtures was received by the British ministry as the omen of the failure of negociation. And, from that period, Mr. Fox is said to have despaired of its successful issue. The English cabinet considered this intimation as a departure from the principles and basis of the negociation, which had been held out to them as inducements to treat, and as an indication of the little reliance that could be placed in the language or sincerity of the French negociators. The instructions, therefore, to Lord Yarmouth, were distinct and peremptory. He was directed to insist generally on the recurrence to the original overtures, and to make the re-admission of Sicily as the sine qua non of the production of his full powers, which, to avoid all pretence of cavil, were conveyed to him without delay. In the mean time, the Russian plenipotentiary, M. D'Oubril, who had arrived at Paris on the 10th of July, had signed a separate peace with the French government. In this posture of affairs, Lord Lauderdale was dispatched to Paris. The health of Mr. Fox began at this period to decline, and the nomination of his personal friend, and tried political adherent, was a pledge that the cabinet continued to promote his views, and to consult the spirit of his policy. The first endeavour of Lord Lauderdale, on his arrival at Paris, was to bring back the French government to the basis of the uti possidetis, and to the application of that principle to the island of Sicily. Lord Yarmouth, after having for that purpose concurred with his colleagues, in representing formally and officially the substance and tendency of M. Talleyrand's original overtures, left the subsequent part of the negociation exclusively in his hands. The French negociators, (for M. Champagny, minister of the interior, was soon appointed joint plenipotentiary with General Clarke,) never actually

Mr. Fox's accession to power, whatever political hopes it might excite, was a circumstance pregnant to himself with inconvenience and danger. The business of the House of Commons he was, in a few months, from his impaired health, obliged to abandon; but with this deduction from his harassing employments, the remainder pressed too heavily upon him; and it was not long before the most decided indications of dropsy appeared. The operation of tapping was several times performed, producing that temporary relief which it seldom fails to effect: but the disease was too formidable for effectual resistance, and, in a short time, even for mitigation. After a series of increasing languors, this great man closed his connection with all mortal scenes, at Chiswick, the seat of the Duke of Devonshire, on the 13th of September, in the 59th year of his age.*

On the death of Mr. Fox, Lord Howick was appointed to the foreign office, in the situation of his departed friend; Mr. Grenville, First Lord of the Admiralty, in the place of Lord Howick; Mr. Tierney, President of the Board of Controul, in the place of Mr. Grenville, who had succeeded to that office, with a seat in the cabinet, on the appointment of Lord Minto to the government of Bengal; Lord Sidmouth to succeed to the Presidency of the Council, from which Earl Fitzwilliam, on account of bad health, was desirous to withdraw; and Lord Holland to succeed Lord Sidmouth, as Lord Privy Seal. The only new member brought into the cabinet was Lord Holland, the nephew of Mr. Fox. A dissolution of Parliament immediately followed; and the returns to the new Parliament were such as, on the whole, to add to the weight and influence of the friends of administration in the House of Commons.

Towards the close of this year, disturbances broke out in the north of Ireland, occasioned by a banditti, who, assuming the name of "Thrashers," committed every species of crime and outrage, under the cover of night. Strong applications were made to the Castle to quell these riotous proceedings by the insurrection law; but the Duke of Bedford refused to resort to so violent a remedy, and by a proper use of the ordinary and regular authority of government, he succeeded effectually in repressing and putting a stop to these alarming symptoms.

At the close of the preceding year, Admiral Villaumez, accompanied by Jerome Buonaparte, succeeded actually admitted the basis of the uti possidetis, after the arrival of Lord Lauderdale, and constantly evaded the acknowledgement of having in the first instance made that proposal. They contrived, however, under various pretences, to detain Lord Lauderdale at Paris, till it became the policy of Britain, as well as of France, to await the decision of the court of St. Petersburgh, on the treaty which M. D'Oubril had carried thither for ratification. On the 3d of September, a courier brought the intelligence to Paris, that the Emperor of Russia had refused to ratify M. D'Oubril's treaty, and M. Talleyrand, with great apparent frankness, informed the British negociator of this piece of intelligence, the day after its arrival in Paris, and assured him that France was now prepared to make peace with England on more favourable terms than she otherwise would have been disposed to admit; but, as it was soon obvious, that the abandonment of Russia was to be the price of more favourable terms, so ostentatiously announced to Great Britain, the honourable determination of our court not to listen to any such projects, prevented any precise detail of the concessions France was willing to make for the attainment of her object. Mr. Fox was now unable to discharge the duties of his office, and the expectations of bringing the negociations to a favourable issue were daily diminished. In the mean while, Buonaparte had left Paris for the army on the Rhine, and one of the plenipotentiaries (General Clarke,) as well as M. Talleyrand, accompanied him on his journey. M. Champagny, who remained to conduct the negociation, was neither authorised to relinquish the claims of Joseph upon Sicily, nor to acquiesce in such an arrangement as would have satisfied the court of St. Petersburgh. The negociation was therefore at an end, and Lord Lauderdale peremptorily insisted on his passports. These were at length granted, but accompanied by a note, evidently composed under the direction of Buonaparte, insinuating that the principles of Mr. Fox had been abandoned by his colleagues and successors; that a departure from the basis laid down by him had thrown the first obstacles in the way of pacification, and that to the loss of that great man alone was to be ascribed the further continuance of the calamities of war. To these charges, Lord Lauderdale delivered a spirited, manly, and convincing reply.

Though the grounds upon which the discussion had broken off were unknown, the intelligence of Lord Lauderdale's departure from Paris was received at the Royal Exchange, in London, with bursts of approbation, and shouts of applause; and the prospect of the continuance of the war, served to shew the determined spirit of the nation, in supporting a war into which it had been plunged by the general enemy of Europe and of mankind.

* The regret occasioned by this event was evinced by the general feeling at the reception of the intelligence, notwithstanding it had been so long expected, and by that procession which some time after took place on the solemn interment. The funeral, though performed at private expense, was attended by the most distinguished nobility, members of the House of Commons, many dignitaries of the church, men of genius and talents from all quarters, a numerous body of the electors of Westminster, and gentlemen deputed from distant parts of the country, in testimony of their respect for the character of the deceased, and an immense assemblage of the general population of the metropolis. The private character of this great man appears to have abounded in all those qualities which can conciliate affection and esteem. The independence of his mind was totally unmixed with any portion of that surly asperity with which it is too frequently connected; and while it excited respect, it did not impair attachment. The frankness of his manners, the generosity of his feelings, which were unalloyed by the smallest particle of gall; the elevation of his principles; and that self-oblivion, which he displayed in circumstances, where personal interest, in common minds, appears to absorb every other sentiment; procured for him in return, a degree of regard, which perhaps was scarcely ever extended to any human individual, as he appears to have been excelled by no one in the tenderness of his affections, the sublimity of his views, and the comprehension and sagacity of his understanding. This distinguished character was born on the 13th of January, 1749. Charles James Fox was the second son of Lord Henry Holland, by the sister of the Duke of Richmond. After a short initiation at Westminster school, he was removed to Eton, and from Eton to Oxford, where he is said to have studied more than ten hours a day, during the whole time. The uniformity of a college life did not long agree with the ardour of his mind, and after some time spent at the University, he set out on the usual tour of Europe. Though he indulged freely in the dissipations over which his rank and fortune gave him the command, he did not fail to acquire that intimate knowledge of the world, and of human nature, which fitted him for the most exalted rank in the state. An unfortunate attachment to the gaming table, was the principal error of Mr. Fox's youth; and before he was eighteen years of age he had lavished away large sums of money, and contracted very heavy debts. His father, apprised of these excesses, recalled his favourite son. At nineteen years of age, he was elected a member of Parliament for Midhurst, and his first speech was in favour of ministers, and against Mr. Wilkes and the Middlesex election. After sharing the favours of the minister as a Lord of the Admiralty, and afterwards as a Lord of the Treasury, he was dismissed from office by a laconic epistle from Lord North, in the following words:—"His Majesty has thought proper to order a new commission of treasury to be made out, in which I do not see your name."

At the general election in 1780, Mr. Fox became a candidate for the city of Westminster, in which, after a violent contest, he succeeded. During the American war he was a regular and active antagonist of the ministry, and the powerful and frequent application of his talents to popular purposes, obtained him the title of "The man of the people." On the removal of Lord North he was raised to a seat in the cabinet as Secretary of State. The death of the Marquis of Rockingham soon after dissolved the new ministry, and Mr. Fox, after some time opposing the measures of Lord Shelburne, returned to power by his well known coalition with Lord North. The memorable India bill proved fatal to the coalition ministry. On the regency question, in 1788, Mr. Fox insisted upon the right of the Prince to the regency. To the war of the French revolution, Mr. Fox, in every stage of its progress, gave his decided negative. Finding his efforts without effect, he determined to secede from Parliament. In 1803, he returned to his Parliamentary duty, and the death of his political rival, in the beginning of 1806, brought him, after an interval of two and twenty years, into his former office of Secretary of State for foreign affairs. Aware that he had but a short space before him, he declared that he should die contented, if he could but previously obtain a peace—an honourable peace, for Britain; remove all legal disabilities arising out of religion, in order to unite more closely the interests of Ireland with those of England; and lastly, obtain a complete abolition of the slave trade. To an extraordinary natural capacity, improved and embellished by a liberal education; and to a quickness of apprehension, which instantly seized every object that was presented to it, this great man added a memory richly stored with science and literature, and well fraught with historical and political knowledge. He was profoundly versed in the history and constitution of his country. He was well acquainted with the history, the strength, the policy, the separate and relative interests and views of those states which once constituted what has not been improperly called the great republic of Europe. As a public speaker, his manner was not graceful, but it was peculiarly animated and impressive. His merit as a Parliamentary debater, did not consist in the length, variety, or roundness of his periods; but in the truth and vigour of his conceptions; in the depth and extent of his information, in the retentive powers of his memory; in the faculty of spreading out his matter so clearly to the grasp of his own mind, as to render it impossible that he should ever fail in the utmost clearness and distinctness to others; and in the exuberant fertility of his invention, which spontaneously brought forth his ideas at the moment, in every possible shape by which the understanding might sit in the most accurate judgment upon them. Resignation to Providence was a marked feature in the character of Mr. Fox. His departure out of this life was unruffled by remorse; he had sacrificed every thing that was personal to his country's good; and his dying moments were blessed with the reflection that his last effort had been conformable to the Divine religion he professed—to give peace to the world. "I die happy," was one of the last sentences that fell from his expiring lips.

in escaping from port, with 11 sail of the line, and a number of frigates. After continuing in company for 10 days, the fleet separated into two different squadrons, one of which, consisting of five ships of the line, two frigates, and a corvette, under the command of Admiral Le Seigle, steered for St. Domingo, and having arrived at that port, disembarked a body of troops, and a supply of ammunition for the use of the colony. On the 6th of February, Admiral Sir J. T. Duckworth, with a British fleet under his command, consisting of seven ships of the line, and four frigates, discovered the French squadron to windward of Ocoa bay. The enemy endeavoured to effect his escape, but by the judicious manœuvres of the British Admiral, this intention was frustrated. The French, however, fought with great gallantry; but, after an engagement of two hours, Admiral Le Seigle ran his ship, the Imperiale, ashore, and was followed by the Captain of the Diomede. The other three ships of the line struck, and were immediately taken possession of by the conquequerors, but the smaller vessels got off. The Imperiale and the Diomede were, after the engagement, both destroyed by the British fleet. The other squadron of Villaumez, amounting to six sail of the line, with three frigates, was originally destined for the Cape of Good Hope, but having been informed of the capture of that settlement by the English, they steered first to the coast of Brazil, and afterwards to the West Indies. In June, Admiral Cochrane, the English Admiral upon the windward station, who had, at that time, only four sail of the line and three frigates, discovered the enemy near Barbadoes, but contented himself with watching his motions, not considering it safe to hazard an engagement with such a disparity of force. The ruin of this hostile fleet was soon after accomplished by the fury of the elements. A gale of wind, one of the most tremendous ever experienced, separated the ships of the enemy, on the 18th of August, and the French Admiral reached the Havannah, with extreme difficulty. The Impetueux made for the coast of North America, and was followed into the Chesapeak by his Majesty's ships the Belleisle and Bellona, where she was run ashore, and burnt by the crew of the Melampus. Of the remaining vessels, two were eventually destroyed by the English, on the same coast; but the Castor, which was supposed to have foundered at sea, reached the port of Brest, in the middle of October.

Admiral Linois had long carried on a predatory warfare in the Indian seas. The Isle of France had been the grand depot of the plunder he had collected, whence, in different bottoms, it had been transferred to France. Thither the Admiral's ship, the Marengo, of 80 guns, and 744 men, and the Belle Poule, of 40 eighteen-pounders, and 320 men, were this year bending their course, having completed their levies on British property, and looking forward to the splendid enjoyment of the produce of their toil. These hopes, however, were frustrated by Sir J. B. Warren, with one of the squadrons which had been dispatched in pursuit of Jerome Buonaparte. On the morning of the 13th of March, at day-light, the French ships were seen to windward, when, after a running fight of about three hours, the Marengo was obliged to strike to the British flag, and her example was speedily followed by the Belle Poule. This event diffused general satisfaction throughout Britain, and afforded some atonement for the depredations committed by Linois, upon our commerce.

On the 24th of September, five large frigates, and two corvettes, with troops, on board, for the West Indies, having escaped from Rochefort, were on the following day met at sea, by a British squadron under Commodore Sir Samuel Hood, and, after a running fight of several hours, four of the five frigates were compelled to strike. The loss of the English amounted to only nine killed, and 32 wounded, but Sir Samuel Hood received a severe wound in the right arm, which rendered amputation necessary. Several distinguished actions, of a minor nature, occurred in the course of the year.

In August, 1805, an expedition to the Cape of Good Hope had sailed from England, consisting of about 5000 land troops, under Sir David Baird, with a provisional naval force, commanded by Sir Home Popham. Having touched at San Salvador for refreshment, the expedition sailed thence, on the 20th of November, and reached Table Bay, on the 4th of January. It was found impossible to land the troops nearer to Cape Town than Saldanha, and Lospard's Bay. The debarkation was conducted with perfect order, under the protection of the fleet; and, on the 8th, the army, consisting of the 25th, 59th, 71st, 72d, 83d, and 93d, regiments, was formed into two brigades, with two howitzers, and six light field-pieces, and moved forwards on the road towards Cape Town.—Having ascended the summit of the Blauberg, or Blue Mountains, and dislodged the enemy's light troops, their main body, under the command of Lieutenant-General Janssens, was discovered drawn up in two lines, and in motion, to anticipate the approach of the British troops. The enemy's force was estimated at about 5000 men, principally cavalry, with 23 pieces of cannon. Nothing could surpass or resist the determined bravery of the British troops, headed by their gallant leader, General Ferguson; and the number of the enemy, who covered the plain, served only to augment their ardour, and confirm their discipline. For some time they received the British force with firmness, and maintained their position without dismay, but in the moment of charging, the valour of the British troops bore down all opposition, and forced the Batavians to a precipitate retreat. In this engagement, the loss of the vanquished exceeded 700 killed and wounded, while the loss of the victors amounted only to 15 killed, and 197 wounded and missing. On the 9th, a flag of truce having arrived from the commandant of the garrison of Cape Town, with offers to capitulate, the articles were agreed upon, and the following day the town was surrendered to the British army.—After the battle of the 8th, the Governor-General, Janssens, retired with a body of forces to Hottentot's Holland Kloof, a pass leading to the district of Zwellendam, and seemed disposed to maintain himself in the interior. But General Beresford having been sent against him, he was prevailed upon to surrender, on terms by which the conquest of the colony was completed, and its internal tranquillity secured.*

Sir Home Popham had contributed materially to the expedition being undertaken, by the intelligence which he had communicated to his Majesty's government, of the defenceless state of that important settlement, and of the probability that it would soon be reinforced from Europe. He had also, with other naval officers, been consulted by Mr. Pitt, and Lord Melville, about their designs on South America; and, at their desire, he conferred with General Miranda, on that officer's views and projects in that quarter. The result of these communications had been his appointment to the command of the Diadem, of 64 guns, in Dec. 1804, for the purpose of co-operating with General Miranda, to the extent of taking advantage of any of his proceedings, which might tend to secure to the British a position on the continent of South America. But he had been afterwards given to understand, that, from deference to Russia, all projects, of that nature, had been, for the present, abandoned. Subsequently, however, to the capture of the Cape, circumstances arose, which induced him to take upon himself, a high and extraordinary degree of responsibility. For the spirit with which this proceeding was adopted, the judgment, and gallantry, with which it was executed, and the success,

* By the articles of capitulation signed with General Beresford on the 18th of January, it was agreed, that the whole of the settlement of the Cape of Good Hope, with all its dependencies, and the rights and privileges held and exercised by the Batavian government, should be surrendered to his Britannic Majesty; and that in consideration of the gallant conduct of the army under General Janssens, they should be embarked, and sent straight to Holland, at the expense of the British government, and not considered prisoners of war.

by which it was attended, it is probable, that, had Mr. Pitt's administration continued to subsist, Sir Home Popham, instead of being censured, recalled, and tried by a Court-Martial, would have been honoured and rewarded. Not aware of the new system, adopted by the new ministers—ignorant that they would affect to treat the capture of the Cape of Good Hope, as wholly insignificant, and even refuse the thanks of Parliament to the gallant captors—he never lost sight of what he erroneously conceived to be their wishes and intentions. Early in the month of February, Sir Home received accounts of the termination of the war in India. In the course of the same month, he also received the news of Lord Nelson's glorious victory off Trafalgar, and the account of a general coalition against France, from an alliance with which power it was evident the Emperor Alexander had not been able to detach Spain. Towards the end of February, a Danish vessel, which arrived at the Cape, brought English newspapers, giving an account of the fate of the Austrian army. By the capture of the Volontaire French frigate, on the 4th of March, he learned the defeat of the Russian army, at Austerlitz; that Buonaparte was in possession of Vienna; and that, when Villaumez sailed from Brest, he left in that port, no more than six ships of war, of which three only were fit for service. From a German officer, who was taken prisoner in the Volontaire, he also collected presumptive evidence respecting the ulterior destination of Villaumez's squadron, as induced to adopt the idea, that, after cruizing a certain time on the bank of Laguilles, he would put into the Brazils, for water and refreshments, and thence proceed to the West Indies, more especially after he should have been informed, that the Cape was actually taken by the British forces. Indeed, so strongly did this presumption operate on his mind, that he dispatched a small copper-bottomed transport brig to Admiral Cochrane, at Barbadoes, to apprise him of what he conceived, was the most likely course to be pursued by Villaumez. He also dispatched the Protector gun-brig to Sir Edward Pellew, in India, and the Rolla brig, to endeavour to fall in with whatever British squadron might be employed in the blockade of the Mauritius. Thus, having performed his duty, in transmitting such intelligence as he was possessed of, to the East and West Indies, and other parts; and finding that the winter season was about to commence, during which no ships could lie in Table Bay, in safety, he forwarded a dispatch (April 9) to the Admiralty, informing them of his intention to leave the Cape, with his squadron, immediately. His design was, to cruize, for a short time, off the coast of Brazil, with a view of falling in with Villaumez, who might be expected in those parts, to refresh. Accordingly, on the day following, he got under weigh; but, in consequence of a calm succeeding, he was obliged to anchor in the outer part of the bay. In the evening, he received some intelligence of the weak state of Buenos Ayres, and Monte Video.—He imparted this information to Sir David Baird, next morning, and suggested the expediency of his sparing a few troops, to enable him to bring a question of such importance to an immediate issue. As Sir Home's recent intelligence fully corroborated what he had before heard, from various quarters; and, as Sir David Baird was fully convinced, from a combination of circumstances, of the perfect safety of the Cape, that officer did not hesitate in acceding to his request. Of all this, Sir Home, in a letter of the 13th of April, duly apprised government; as also, of his intention of applying to the Governor of St. Helena for a reinforcement of troops. Sir Home Popham accordingly sailed from the Cape, with a detachment of troops under the command of Major-General Beresford; obtained a reinforcement at St. Helena;* and, by the conjoint exertions of Sir Home Popham, and Major-General Beresford, with the officers, and men, under their command, Buenos Ayres, and its dependencies, were compelled to surrender to his Majesty's arms, on the 2d of July. The total amount of the treasure taken at this place, was 1,291,323 dollars; of which 1,086,208 were sent home, in the Narcissus; but, in consequence of the subsequent recapture of the settlement, a considerable part of the remainder was lost. The captors, also, generously gave up to the respective proprietors, a number of coasting vessels, with their cargoes, to the estimated amount of 1,500,000 dollars. At the time of sending home his official dispatches, announcing this capture, Sir Home Popham also transmitted letters containing much important commercial information, to some of our corporate manufacturing towns; a circumstance which, though laudable in itself, proved the highly injurious, in a mercantile view, and drew down much censure and calumny upon its author. No sooner had Sir Home Popham found himself in possession of Buenos Ayres, than he wrote back to the Cape, in the most urgent terms, for a naval reinforcement; which, had it been sent in time, would, there is scarcely a doubt, not only have prevented the recapture of the settlement, but would have put Monte Video also completely in our power. Owing to the non-arrival of reinforcements, Buenos Ayres was unfortunately wrested from us, on the 12th of August following.†

On the 19th of December, Lord Howick, in terms of severe reprehension, announced the recal of Sir

* His little army, after all, did not exceed 7,600 men, including marines. With this force, he steered for Rio Plata, and arrived at the mouth of that river in the beginning of June. It was now debated, whether an attack should be made on Buenos Ayres or Monte Video, and the former being preferred, the troops were removed from the line of battle ships into the transports and frigate that accompanied the expedition, in which, after surmounting with great skill and perseverance the difficulties of the most intricate navigation, they arrived before Buenos Ayres, on the 24th of June, and next day disembarked without resistance on Punta de Quilmes, about twelve miles from that city. A body of Spaniards, placed on a height, at two miles distant, witnessed the landing of the British army without opposing it, and General Beresford having marched against them on the following morning, they fled with precipitation at the first fire, leaving behind them their artillery. No other difficulty occurred after this success, except the passage of a river, which it was necessary to cross in the way to Buenos Ayres; but this being effected with the aid of rafts and boats, General Beresford entered the city on the 27th, the Viceroy having previously abandoned it, and fled to Cordova, with the small body of troops under his command. While the army was thus employed in the conquest of Buenos Ayres, the line of battle ships of the squadron made demonstrations before Monte Video and Maldonado, in order to alarm and occupy the garrisons of these places, in which, as it afterwards appeared, were stationed the regular troops of the colony, while the defence of Buenos Ayres, from its situation, supposed to be less liable to attack, had been committed to the militia.

† No sooner had the Spaniards recovered from their panic, and discovered the smallness of the numbers of their opponents, than, ashamed of their defeat, they began to concert measures to expel their invaders. Emissaries from Buenos Ayres excited the country people to arms, and an insurrection was organized in the heart of the city. Liniers, a French Colonel in the Spanish service, crossed the river in a fog, on the 4th of August, unobserved by the English cruisers, and landed at Conchas, above Buenos Ayres, bringing with him about 1,000 men from Monte Video and Sacramento. Encouraged by this reinforcement, the armed levies from the country, which had been defeated by General Beresford in a sally, advanced again to the city, and summoned the castle to surrender. All the inhabitants of the town were now in arms, and the danger appeared so imminent, that the English had determined to evacuate the place, and retire to their ships: but they were prevented by the state of the weather, and after a desperate action on the 12th, in the streets, and great square of the town, in which they were attacked with incredible fury, and severely annoyed by a destructive fire from the windows and balconies of the houses, they were compelled to lay down their arms. The terms on which they surrenderd became afterwards the subject of dispute and recrimination between Generals Beresford and Liniers, who acted as Commander-in-chief of the Spaniards. Thus much only is certain, that, contrary to the articles of capitulation signed by Liniers, the English were detained prisoners of war, and marched up the country. The loss of the British army in the action of the 12th, amounted to 165 killed, wounded, and missing, besides 1,300 made prisoners. At the time when the city was taken, Sir Home Popham was riding off the coast; but he continued to blockade the river with his squadron till the arrival of the troops from the Cape of Good Hope, in the month of October, enabled him to re-commence offensive operations. In renewing his efforts against South America, his first attempt was to make himself master of Monte Video, but finding it impossible for the ships to approach near enough to batter the walls, he was obliged to desist from the enterprise. On the 29th of October, a body of British troops was landed at Maldonado, under Colonel Vassal, and the Spaniards having been driven from that place, and from the isle of Gorriti, a sufficient space was gained for the encampment of the troops, and a tolerably safe anchorage procured for the ships. In this situation our army in South America remained at the end of the present year, receiving successive reinforcements from England and the Cape, and preparing for further enterprises.

Home

Home Popham. That officer arrived in London, on the 17th of February following; and, on the 18th, he was put under a formal arrest, preparatory to his being brought to trial by a Court-Martial, for acting without orders, and for leaving the Cape of Good Hope in an unprotected state. Sir Home Popham made an able and luminous defence to the respective charges urged against him; but the Court adjudged him to be severely reprimanded.

This year the negroes of St. Domingo rose against Dessalines, their chief, who, in imitation of Buonaparte, had assumed the title of Emperor of Hayti, and having come upon him by surprise, put him to death—a catastrophe which he had merited by the cruelty and injustice of his government. His successor, Christophe, contented himself with the humbler title of Chief of the government of Hayti; and, in that capacity, issued a proclamation, bearing date the 24th of October, 1806, liberally opening, to neutral nations, the commerce of his dominions.

Differences had existed, for a considerable time, between the United States of America, and Spain, arising out of the ill-defined boundaries of Louisiana; and the Spaniards had made inroads on the district of New Orleans, and the Mississippi, even in those parts that had been expressly and unequivocally ceded to the United States. At the same time, some disputes between America and the English government had assumed an important character. The complaint of the United States against Great Britain involved three points:—First, The practice of impressing British seamen found on board of American merchant vessels, on the high seas. Second, The violation of their rights, as neutrals, by seizing and condemning their merchantmen, though engaged in what they considered a lawful commerce: and Third, The infringement of their maritime jurisdiction upon their own coasts.—The conferences, which were held in London, for the adjustment of these differences, by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinckney, on the part of the United States, and by Lord Holland and Lord Auckland, on the part of Great Britain, terminated in a treaty, from which the President of the United States thought proper to withhold his ratification.*

The successes of the French arms against Austria, proved particularly unfortunate for the kingdom of Naples. A treaty of neutrality between France and that country, had been concluded at Paris, on the 21st of September, 1805, and ratified at Portici, by the King of Naples, on the 8th of the following month. By this treaty, the Neapolitan court engaged to remain neutral in the war between France and the allied powers, and to repel by force, every encroachment on her neutrality. Scarcely, however, had six weeks elapsed after the ratification of this treaty, when a squadron of English and Russian vessels appeared in the bay of Naples, and were permitted to land a body of forces in that city and its vicinity. This was considered, by Buonaparte, as an act of perfidy deserving of the severest punishment, and on the morning after the signature of the treaty of Presburgh, Buonaparte issued a proclamation from his head-quarters at Vienna, declaring, "that the Neapolitan dynasty had ceased to reign." That no time might be lost in carrying this threat into execution, the French army, under Joseph Buonaparte, marched, in three divisions, against the kingdom of Naples; the right, commanded by General Regnier, proceeding against Gaeta; and the centre, under Marshal Massena, through Capua; while the left advanced through Istria, under General Lacy.—On the 12th of February, Capua was invested by the French troops, and on the 13th, a deputation from the city waited on Prince Joseph, and signed a capitulation, by which Capua, Gaeta, Peschieri, Naples, and the other fortresses of that kingdom, were surrendered into the hands of the enemy. The spirit of their inhabitants, however, was not conquered. Insurrections were numerous. Mutual exasperation gradually led to the establishment, by the French, of military commissions at Naples, and throughout the country. The triumphant entrance of Joseph Buonaparte into Naples, to take upon himself the sovereignty of his kingdom, to which he had been appointed by his brother, to the exclusion of the recent dynasty, was attended by those acclamations and addresses which can always be procured by power. The invader and the patriot, however, were still in determined and active hostility; and the feelings of the contending parties, were, to the highest degree, enfuriated. The brave Calabrians, in particular, inflicted severe vengeance for the murders of the French. Subsequently to the evacuation of Naples, by the Russian and British troops, Sir James Craig retired to Sicily, with the English army, accompanied by the royal family of Naples, and established his head-quarters at Messina. There he remained till April, when bad health compelled him to resign his command to Sir John Stuart, who was soon after intrusted, by his Sicilian Majesty, with the defence of the eastern coast from Melazzo to Cape Passaro. The army continued at Messina, till the end of June, without attempting any offensive operations against the enemy; at which period, the English General, at the urgent solicitations of the court of Palermo, consented to land, with a part of his army, in Calabria, and to make trial of the loyalty and affection of the people to their former sovereign. The troops destined to this expedition, amounted to about 4800 effective men; with this small force, Sir John Stuart landed, without any material opposition, on the morning of the 1st of July, in the gulf of St. Eufemia, near the northern frontier of Lower Calabria. The French General, Regnier, having been apprised of the debarkation of the English army, made a rapid march from Reggio, uniting his detached corps as he advanced, and anticipating, with his characteristic confidence, the defeat of the British troops. On the morning of the 3d, he advanced into the neighbourhood of Maida, about ten miles distant from the English army, and took up his position on a ridge of heights. His force, at that moment, consisted of about 4000 infantry, and 300 cavalry, together with four pieces of artillery, and he was in daily expectation of being joined by 3000 more troops, who were marching after him in a second division, and who joined the French army, on the night of the 3d. Perceiving that no time was to be lost, Sir John Stuart determined to advance towards the position of the enemy, and having left four companies of Watteville's regiment, under Major Fisher, to protect the stores, and occupy the works that had been thrown up at the place of landing, at three o'clock the next morning, the body of the British army commenced its march along the borders of the sea, across the plain of Eufemia. Sir Sidney Smith, at this time, took up a position with a small squadron placed under his command, to act as circumstances might occur; but, from the situation of the two armies, no co-operation from the navy could take place. A vast plain, extending from four to six miles in breadth, and flanked by chains of mountains, which ran nearly parallel from sea to sea, and which form the interior boundaries of the two Calabrias, seemed to favour the manœuvres of both armies, and afforded a fair opportunity for trying the skill and gallantry of the contending nations. Had General Regnier thought proper to remain upon his elevated ground, flanked, as he was, by a thick impervious underwood, no impression could have been made upon him; but, quitting this advantage, and crossing the river Amato, with his entire force, he descended from the eminence, and met the British army upon the open plain. After some close firing of the flankers, to cover the deployments of the two armies, by nine o'clock, in the morning, the opposing fronts were warmly engaged, when the prowess of the rival nations seemed fairly at issue before the world. The corps which formed the right of the advanced line of the British, was the battalion of light infantry, commanded by Colonel Kempt, consisting of the light companies of the 20th, 27th, 35th, 61st, 81st, and Watteville's, together with 150 chosen battalion-men of the 35th regiment, under Major Robinson; directly opposite to whom was the favourite French regiment, the 1st Legere. The two companies, at the distance of about 100 yards, fired reciprocally a few rounds, when, as if by mutual agreement, the firing was suspended, and in compact order, and awful silence, they advanced towards each other, till their bayonets began to cross. At this momentous crisis, the enemy became appalled. Their ranks were broken, and they endeavoured to fly; but it was too late, they were overtaken, and the most dreadful slaughter ensued. Brigadier-General Auckland, whose brigade was immediately on the left of the light infantry, availed himself of this favourable moment to press instantly forward upon the corps in front; the brave 78th regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Macleod, and the 81st regiment, under Major Plenderleath, both distinguished themselves on this occasion. Advancing with shouts of victory, the enemy fled with dismay and disorder before them. General Regnier, finding his army thus discomfited on the left, began to make a new effort with the right, in hopes of retrieving the disasters of the day. This operation was resisted, most gallantly, by the brigade under Brigadier-General Cole. Nothing could shake the undaunted firmness of the grenadiers under Lieutenant-Colonel O'Callaghan, and of the 27th regiment under Lieutenant-Colonel Smith. The French cavalry successively repelled from before the front of these regiments, made an effort to turn their left; but, at that moment, Lieutenant-Colonel Ross, who had, the same morning, landed from Messina, with the 20th regiment, and had come up to the army during the action, threw his regiment opportunely into a small cover upon the enemy's flank, and by a heavy and well-concerted fire, rendered this attempt abortive. This was the last feeble struggle of the enemy, who, astonished and dismayed by the intrepidity with which they were assailed, began precipitately to retire, leaving the field covered with their dead. About 700 Frenchmen were buried upon the ground; the wounded and prisoners amounted to above 1000; and about the same number were left in Monteleone, and the different posts between Maida and Reggio, who signified their readiness to surrender, whenever a British force could be sent to receive their submission, and to protect them from the fury of the inhabitants. The total loss of the French, amounted to at least 4000 men, while the loss of the English did not exceed 326; of which number, 282 were wounded, and 44 slain. This splendid victory was attended with no permanent advantage with respect to the immediate object of the expedition; but the impression it was calculated to make in favour of the discipline and bravery of the British soldiers, was of incalculable importance.

* The American plenipotentiaries consented, contrary, as it appears, to their instructions, to proceed on an official paper from Lord Holland and Lord Auckland, dated the 8th of November, pledging the government of Great Britain, "to issue instructions for the observance of the greatest caution in the impressing of British seamen, and of the greatest care to preserve citizens of the United States from any molestation or injury, and to afford immediate redress upon any representation of injury sustained by them;" and engaging besides, at any future period, "to entertain the discussion of any plan that should be devised to secure the interests of both states, without any injury to the rights to which they are respectively attached." On the other questions between the two countries, the negociators were more fortunate in bringing their labours to a successful issue. On the subject of the circuitous trade permitted to the United States, between the colonies of the enemy and other parts of the world, an article was framed, which satisfied the American commissioners, by substituting a clear and precise rule for the regulation of that commerce, in place of the uncertain and changeable system by which it had hitherto been conducted. The principle of this article was taken from Lord Hawkesbury's communication to Mr. Rufus King, defining the difference between a continuous and an interrupted voyage; but besides requiring, as in that communication, that the goods should be landed, and the duties paid in the neutral country, that article expressly stipulated, that on re-exportation there should remain after the drawback a duty to be paid of one per cent. ad valorem, on articles of the growth, produce, and manufacture of Europe; and on all articles of colonial produce a duty of not less than two per cent. ad valorem. The maritime jurisdiction of the United States was guaranteed by another article, against the alledged encroachments and violations of his Majesty's cruisers; and on account of the peculiar circumstances of the American coast, an extension of maritime jurisdiction, to the distance of five miles from shore, was mutually conceded by both parties in the American seas, on certain conditions, and with certain limitations expressed in the treaty. On the other articles of the treaty, the commercial stipulations contained in them appear to have been framed on the fairest and most liberal principles of reciprocal advantage and utility.

The entire conquest of the Neapolitan territory, however, by the arms of France, soon followed this illustrious victory. The support of the British arms being withdrawn, the enthusiasm of the Calabrians abated, and they finally yielded to a fate which they had nobly resisted, without the least hope of success attending their gallant and persevering endeavours.

Prussia, towards the close of the year 1805, had disappointed the hopes of England, and of Europe at large. On the 27th of January, a proclamation was published by the King of Prussia, addressed to the inhabitants of Hanover, in which it was observed, that after the events which terminated in the peace of Presburgh, the only means of preserving the country from the flames of war, consisted in forming a convention with Buonaparte, in virtue of which the states of his Britannic Majesty, in Germany, were to be wholly occupied and governed by Prussia, till the return of peace; and all the authorities of that country were called upon to conform to the dispositions made for that purpose, under the civil and military administration of General Kecknert, and the commissioners chosen by him. This proceeding called forth an official note from Mr. Fox, under date of the 17th of March, addressed to Baron Jacobi, the Prussian minister in London, wherein he expressed "the great anxiety, felt by his Majesty, at the manner in which possession had been taken of the electorate of Hanover," and desired him explicitly to inform his court, "that no convenience or political arrangement, much less any offer of equivalent or indemnity, would ever induce his Majesty so far to forget what was due to his legitimate rights, as well as to the exemplary fidelity and attachment of his Hanoverian subjects, as to consent to the alienation of the electorate." Soon after the delivery of this note, his Prussian Majesty thought proper to drop the slight veil with which he had attempted the concealment of his real designs, by publishing, on the 1st of April, a proclamation, in which he stated the conclusion of a convention between himself and Buonaparte, for the exchange of Hanover in return for three provinces of his monarchy: and as the Hanoverian states were possessed by France, in right of conquest, he declared that the rightful possession of the electoral states of the house of Brunswick, situated in Germany, had passed over to him, in return for the above cession on his part; that they were now subjected only to his power; and that, thenceforth, their government would be administered in his name alone, and under his supreme authority. A proclamation was also issued by the court of Berlin, on the 28th of March, in which it was declared, that, in virtue of a treaty concluded between his Prussian Majesty, and the Emperor of France, and King of Italy, the ports of the German Ocean, (the North Sea) and the rivers which empty themselves into it, shall be shut against British shipping and trade in the same manner as was practised while Hanover was occupied by French troops. As soon as intelligence reached London of the actual exclusion of British shipping from the Elbe, and of the determination of Prussia to shut all the ports of the German Ocean against the British flag, measures of retaliation were adopted.—Notice was given, on the 8th of April, to the ministers of neutral powers, that the necessary means had been taken for the blockade of the rivers Ems, Weser, Elbe, and Trave. A general embargo was laid on all Prussian vessels, in the harbours of Great Britain and Ireland; and this order was extended, on the 16th of the same month, to all vessels belonging to the rivers Elbe, Weser, and Ems, vessels under the Danish flag, only excepted. The English mission, at Berlin, was recalled; and a message from his Majesty was presented to both Houses of Parliament, on the 21st, stating the necessity in which his Majesty found himself, of withdrawing his minister from the court of Berlin, and of adopting, provisionally, measures of just retaliation against the commerce and navigation of Prussia, on account of acts of direct hostility, deliberately pursued against him, which left him no alternative. On the 20th of the same month, a declaration was issued by his Britannic Majesty, in his capacity of Elector of Hanover, recapitulating instances of perfidy, insincerity, and rapacity of the court of Berlin, and solemnly protesting, for himself and his heirs, against every incroachment on his rights in the electorate of Brunswick Lunenburg, and its dependencies. In addition to her war with England, the subserviency of Prussia to France, involved her in hostilities with Sweden.—The Swedish troops, who occupied Luneburg, on behalf of the King of England, having opposed the entrance of the Prussians into that duchy, were compelled, after a slight resistance, to retreat into Mecklenburg; upon which hostile proceeding, the King of Sweden laid an embargo upon all Prussian vessels in his harbours, and issued an order, bearing date the 27th of April, for the blockade of all the Prussian ports in the Baltic. To counteract these hostile operations, Prussia commenced preparations for the expulsion of the Swedish troops from the states of Pomerania; but, before this design could be carried into effect, a new revolution in her politics took place, which gave a totally different direction to her arms.—The feelings of the Prussian nation were decidedly hostile to France; and the Queen, young, beautiful, and persuasive, indignant at the usurpations and insults of France, and jealous of her husband's honour and reputation, joined in the same cause. The first public act of the cabinet of St. Cloud, which gave serious offence and alarm to the cabinet of Berlin, was the investiture of Murat, with the duchies of Berg and Cleves. But a deeper and more sensible injury awaited the Prussian government: while Laforest, the French resident at Berlin, was urging the ministers of that court, to persist in the measures they had adopted for the retention of Hanover, Lucchesini, the Prussian minister at Paris, discovered that the French government had offered to the King of Great Britain, the complete restitution of the electoral dominions. Fortunately, however, as Prussia then thought, the negociation for peace between France and Russia, after preliminaries had been signed at Paris, was broken off by the refusal of the court of St. Petersburgh to ratify the treaty concluded by M. D'Oubril. But this event, while it opened to Prussia the prospect of assistance, in case she should be driven to a war with France, disclosed to her further proof of the secret enmity of the cabinet of St. Cloud, and of its readiness to abandon her interests. She was now, for the first time, apprised, that during the negociations at Paris, between France and Russia, distinct hints had been given to M. D'Oubril, that if his court was desirous of annexing any part of Polish Prussia to its dominions, no opposition would be interposed against such a project by France.* The discussions between France and Prussia had, at length, advanced to a point which left no prospect of friendly arrangement. The court of Berlin, no longer influenced by a temporising policy, assumed a tone of firmness and decision: the troops were animated to a high degree of enthusiasm, by the expectation of hostilities, which they conceived the honour of the nation had long required; and the zeal of the people coincided with the sentiments of the army. The disposition manifested by the court, was equally approved by foreign powers, as by the subjects of Prussia. The King of Sweden was eager to cherish the prospect which seemed thus to be afforded of checking the power and aggrandisement of France; the Prussian vessels detained in the ports of Great Britain, were speedily liberated, and Lord Morpeth was dispatched to the court of Berlin, with proposals to afford her every assistance and co-operation in the fourth coalition that was at this time forming against France.

On the 24th of September, Buonaparte quitted Paris, to join the armies. Discussions, however, were continued, and even so late as the 5th of October, a dispatch was delivered from the Prussian outposts to the French army, which still afforded an opening for amicable adjustment. Within a few days after, a declaration, stating the grounds of the war, was published by the Prussian cabinet.

The French force had advanced in three divisions;

* The peace of Presburgh had left the forms of the Germanic constitution entire. The residence of the French troops in Germany, however, in consequence of the procrastinated occupation of Cattaro, by the Russians, matured a design suitable to the ambitious mind of Buonaparte, and seemed to suggest the establishment of a new confederation of princes, at the head of which he should himself be placed. This project was arranged with extraordinary promptitude; and on the 12th of July, the act of confederation was executed at Paris, by princes and ministers, who were scarcely allowed time to read the deed to which they affixed their signatures. This document, which subverted the complicated establishment of ages, commences, with observing, that their Majesties, the Emperor of the French, the Kings of Bavaria and Wirtemburg, the Archbishop of Ratisbon, the Elector of Baden, the Duke of Berg, the Landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt, the Princes of Nassau Weilburgh, and Nassau Usingen, of Hohenzollern Hechingen, and Hohenzollern Siegmaringen, Salm Salm, and Salm Kyrburg, Isenburg, Birchstein, and Lichtenstein, the Duke of Aremburg, and the Count of Leyen, being desirous to secure the peace of Southern Germany, which experience had long since proved, could derive no guarantee from the existing constitution, had appointed certain plenipotentiaries to effect arrangements from which this guarantee would naturally and decidedly result. In consequence of the dispositions which had been agreed upon, and which were now ratified, the states of the contracting parties were to be for ever separated from the Germanic body, and united by an act, called "the Confederated States of the Empire." The affairs of this confederation were to be discussed in a congress, which should sit at Frankfort, divided into two colleges of kings and princes, where all disputes should be settled that might arise amongst the members, who could, in no case, enter into the service of any other power than the confederation, nor alienate to any other power, their sovereignty or territory. The elector arch-chancellor was to preside in the congress, under the title of prince primate, and on the demise of any prince primate, the right of naming a successor should attach to the Emperor of France, who was to be proclaimed protector of the confederation. In the event of a continental war, which should involve either the Emperor of France, or any other individual of the union, all parties should make a common cause; and, in case of preparation for war against any one of the parties, his minister should be authorised to demand of the congress, a general arming of the confederation. The congress were to regulate the proportion of assistance to the exigency of the case, and the summons of the Emperor to the parties, was to be the signal for taking the field. The house of Austria, thus stripped of its honours, was compelled to lay down the title of Emperor of Germany; and, by a formal deed of renunciation, Francis the Second resigned his office and title of Emperor of Germany, retaining only the more humble title of Emperor of Austria. When these arrangements were communicated to Prussia, her acquiescence was purchased by the delusive hope, that she would be permitted to form a confederation of states in the north of Germany, under the protection of Prussia, as the confederation of the Rhine was under the protection of France. But, no sooner had Austria submitted to the loss of her ancient imperial dignity, than Prussia, whose meanness was despised, and whose assistance was no longer wanted, was told, that Buonaparte could not permit her to include the Hanseatic towns in her plan of a northern confederation, and that he was determined to take them under his own protection.

Buonaparte had no sooner abolished the name of republic in France, than he sought to extinguish that appellation in the other states of Europe. Amongst other transformations, Louis, a younger brother of Napoleon, was selected to be King of Holland, and unwillingly dragged from the gaieties and delights of Paris, to rule over a laborious and impoverished people. The new constitution which accompanied the King, had no guarantee but the will of its author, nor was it attempted to be disguised, that Holland, though governed by a separate King, was to be considered as virtually a province of France.

Whilst Buonaparte was carrying into effect his projects of aggrandisement in Germany, the pressure of the French armies upon that country was extreme, and a spirit of resistance on the part of the inhabitants was summoned to its noblest exertions in a variety of publications, which soon attracted the notice of the French government. Orders were in consequence given for the apprehension of various booksellers in Franconia, Bavaria, and Suabia. Amongst these persecuted men, the fate of John Palm, a resident of Nuremberg, an imperial town of Germany, possessing laws and tribunals of its own, attracted particular notice. This person was the publisher of a pamphlet, intituled "Germany in the lowest state of degradation," a work written with considerable ability, and which had been read with great avidity. M. Palm was in consequence arrested by order of the French government, and dragged to Braunau, charged with the publication of a work libellous against the French Emperor, and tending to mislead the people of the south of Germany. On his arrival at the fortress, a court-martial was immediately summoned, consisting of General Berthier, seven Colonels of French regiments, and an Adjutant, with a reporter. After sitting for three days, M. Palm, who had not been present during the delivery of the depositions, was brought into court, on the 25th of August, when the evidence was read to him, and his defence heard; he was then ordered to withdraw, and the court, after some consultation, ordered him to be shot within four-and-twenty hours; which sentence was carried into execution on the following day.

the right, consisting of the corps of Marshals Ney and Soult, with a division of Bavarian troops, proceeded by the route of Amberg and Nuremberg, to unite at Bayreuth, in their advance upon Hof, on the southern confines of Saxony: the centre, composed of the reserve, under the Grand Duke of Berg, with the corps of the Prince de Ponte Corvo (Bernadotte) and Marshal Davoust, and the Imperial Guards, marched by Bamberg, towards Culmbach, in Franconia, and by way of Saalberg to Gerra, in Saxony: the left, consisting of the troops of Marshals Lannes and Augereau, took their route for Schweinfurth, towards Coburg, and advanced to Saalfield, in Saxony. The veteran Prussian army, having its right under General Blucher, its centre under the Duke of Brunswick, and its left commanded by Prince Hohenlohe, had taken a very strong position along the north of Frankfort, on the Mayne. The campaign opened, on the 9th of October, with the battle of Schleitz, seven miles to the north-west of Fulda. Here three Prussian regiments sustained, with great firmness, one of the most spirited charges of the enemy's cavalry; but, the efforts of the French were finally successful, and the Prussians were obliged to retreat, with a loss of 700 men, killed, wounded, and prisoners; and 500 waggons, containing military stores, fell into the hands of the victors. On the 10th, the left wing of the French army, under Marshal Lannes, was equally successful at Saalfield, where Prince Louis, of Prussia, brother of Frederick-William, was killed by Marshal De Logis, of the 10th regiment of the French hussars, with whom he was engaged in personal combat. The main body of the Prussian army occupied Eysenach, Gotha, Erfurt, and Weimar, and it was the intention of the Duke of Brunswick, to whom the chief command was confided, to commence hostilities by bearing down with his right wing upon Frankfort, with his centre on Wurtzburg, and his left wing on Bamberg. The French army, however, had, by this time, unexpectedly turned the extremity of the Prussian right wing, and obtained possession of the eastern bank of the Saal occupying, within a very short period, Saalberg, Schleitz, and Gerra. Alarmed by these movements, the arrangements of the Prussian army were immediately changed. The detachments, which had been precipitately urged forward, were recalled; and the head-quarters were removed through Weimar to Auerstadt, in the vicinity of Jena, while General Ruchel occupied the position of Weimar. Such were the arrangements made by the Prussians, previously to the 13th, in anticipation of the ensuing decisive struggle. On the same day, the Grand Duke of Berg, and Marshal Davoust, were, with their corps, at Naumberg, to which place the Prince of Ponte Corvo was in full march: Marshal Lannes proceeded to Jena, whither Buonaparte was also advancing, while his head-quarters were at Gerra. Ney was at Gotha, and Soult was proceeding on the straight road from Naumberg to Jena. In the afternoon of the 13th, Buonaparte arrived at Jena; and, from an elevated flat, near the place, reconnoitred the position of the enemy. The importance of this elevation for the play of the artillery, was so great, that notwithstanding the extreme difficulty, and, indeed, seeming impossibility of its accomplishment, the Herculean labour was, at length, surmounted, and before morning, the artillery was actually planted upon the eminence. The night of the 13th, was deeply interesting. The sentinels were almost close to each other; and the lights of the two armies were within half a cannon-shot. On both sides, all was watchfulness and motion. The divisions of Ney and Soult were occupied the whole night in marching; and, at break of day, the whole of the French troops were under arms. Suchet's division formed the right; the Imperial Guards occupied the summit of a height; and each of these corps had their artillery in the small spaces between them. The morning was obscured by a fog, which continued to prevail for two hours, during which Buonaparte rode along the line, giving the necessary directions. The light troops began the action, by dislodging the Prussians from an apparently inaccessible position on the highway between Jena and Weimar; and the success of this operation enabled the French troops to stretch out without restraint on the plain, where they now formed in order of battle. An army of 50,000 men had been detached, by the Prussians, from their left wing, to cover the defiles of Naumburg, and to possess themselves of the passes of Coesen, in which they were anticipated by Marshal Davoust. The two other armies, one of which amounted to 80,000 men, placed themselves in front of the French army, which now opened out from the level height of Jena. At this crisis, the mist which had hung over the combatants began to dissipate, and both armies beheld each other within the range of cannon-shot. After the first action of the morning, by which the Prussians had been forced to quit their position, the village of Hollstedt became the point of attack, and the Prussians were in full motion to dislodge the French from this station, when Marshal Lannes was ordered to its support. Marshal Soult attacked a wood on the right. The right wing of the Prussians made a movement against the left of the French, which Marshal Augereau was ordered to oppose, and in less than an hour, the action became general. Every manœuvre, on both sides, was performed with as much precision as if it had been executed upon the parade, while 250,000 men, and 700 pieces of artillery, scattered death in every direction. After a struggle of nearly two hours, Soult secured possession of the wood, from which he immediately moved forward, while, at the same instant, the division of the French cavalry in reserve, and two other divisions, just arrived on the field of battle from the corps of Marshal Ney, were, by order of Buonaparte, brought into action, and so much strengthened the French line, as to throw the Prussians into great disorder. By a striking effort of skill and bravery, this disorder was speedily retrieved, and the battle was resumed, and continued for almost an hour. The fate of the day now hung in awful suspense; but the reserve, under the Duke of Berg, precipitated themselves into the midst of the fight, and threw the Prussian troops into extreme confusion. In vain did the cavalry and infantry form themselves into a square, the shock was irresistible, and this most dreadful charge completed their overthrow. On the right, Davoust not only maintained his ground against the great body of Prussians sent to possess the defiles of Coesen, but advancing into the plain, pursued them for three hours, in their retreat to Weimar. In this retreat, the confusion in the Prussian army was extreme, and the King, finding it necessary to quit the road, was obliged to retire across the fields at the head of his regiment of cavalry. The loss of the Prussians, in this battle, is estimated by the French, at 20,000 killed, and from 30 to 40,000 prisoners, besides 300 pieces of cannon, and immense magazines of military stores and provisions: among the prisoners, were more than 20 Generals; Marshal Mollendorf was wounded, and the Duke of Brunswick, and General Ruchel, were killed.* The French acknowledged a loss

* This heroic Prince, Charles William Frederick, Duke of Brunswick, was born on the 9th of October, 1735, O. S. Like all the German Princes of his time, he was bred to the profession of arms. By the time he had attained the age of nineteen, he had experienced many opportunities to distinguish his courage and conduct. His first exploit as a commander, was the capture of Kaya, towards the end of the year 1758. He next advanced against Minden, and having invested the village on the 5th of March, the garrison surrendered at discretion, at the end of nine days. England and her allies were not a little indebted to him, for the victory of Minden. On that memorable day, he encountered and overcame the Duke de Brissac, and thus prevented the Marshal de Contades from making his retreat by the defiles of Wittenkendstein. At the close of the campaign, in 1759, he was detached with 15,000 men, to serve under Frederick the Great, was afterwards present at the battle of Corbach, and though obliged to retreat, he maintained his former reputation. Prince Ferdinand and Marshal Broglio, were, at this period, opposed to each other; and the former having conceived the project of cutting off the communication with France by the Lower Rhine, the hereditary Prince of Brunswick was detached for that purpose. On this occasion, he was anticipated by the Marquis de Castries, and obliged to re-cross the Rhine; but he effected a brilliant retreat with his prisoners, among whom loss on their part of from 4 to 5,000 men; the victory, however, was complete, and the battle of Jena decided the fate of the campaign.*

After this catastrophe, the King of Prussia retreated to Custin; but the approach of the enemy speedily produced the necessity of his further removal, and Koningsberg became the place of his residence, and the rallying point for the wreck of his forces. Here, the last regiments of the Prussian monarchy, amounting to about 50,000 men, collected around Frederick William, and awaited the accession of reinforcements, and the arrival of whatever assistance might be afforded by Russia.

Napoleon, aware that the Elector of Saxony had been forced into the service of Prussia, dismissed 6,000 of his troops on their parole immediately after the battle of Jena. The Elector of Hesse was, on the contrary, deprived of his dominions; as was the Duke of Brunswick. Mecklenburg was also taken possession of by the French; and Hanover was occupied by a detachment under the command of General Mortier. Fulda and Cassel were occupied by other corps of the French troops, and a perfect communication was opened and maintained with the grand army. The next object to be accomplished, and which was no sooner ordered than it was effected, was to take possession of Hamburgh; and the transactions at this place, where all British merchandize and other property were placed under sequestration, flowed from a system of policy explained by a decree of the French Emperor, published at Berlin towards the close of the month of November.†

Immediately after the battle of Jena, the King of Prussia applied to Buonaparte for an armistice; and though this request was refused, he was encouraged to send a plenipotentiary to the head-quarters of the French army, with instructions to negociate a peace. Lucchesini, the Prussian negociator, arrived at Berlin on the 22d of October, and found that Duroc had been named to discuss with him the terms of the proposed treaty. The situation of his Prussian Majesty became every day more desperate, and a very short time was sufficient to shew, that no terms of peace short of unconditional surrender were to be obtained. An armistice was next proposed, and concluded on the 16th of November, but on terms so disadvantageous to Prussia, that the King refused to ratify the act of his minister, preferring rather to try still further the fortune of war, with the aid, and under the banners of his Russian ally.

The Russian General Benningsen, with 4,000 men, at length crossed the Vistula, and arrived at Warsaw, on the 13th of November, whence he pushed on by forced whom was Dumouriez, then an obscure subaltern in the French service. During the campaign of 1762, the hereditary Prince resumed his usual activity. On the 31st of August, having seized on the heights of Joannsberg, he endeavoured to prevent the junction of the armies under the Marshal d'Etrees and the Prince of Conde, but in this attempt he failed of success, and his cannon, and a large body of prisoners, fell into the hands of the enemy. No sooner was a treaty concluded than his Serene Highness returned home to cultivate the arts of peace, and on the 12th of June, 1764, he married the Princess Augusta, sister of King George III. of England. In 1780, his father died, and he succeeded to his titles and dominions. So unremitting were his endeavours to promote the happiness and prosperity of his subjects, that he acquired the glorious title of the "Father of his people." On the death of the old King of Prussia, the title of Field-Marshal was conferred upon the Duke by Frederick-William II. and being appointed to the command of the Prussian army, he succeeded in over-running Holland, and reinstating the Stadtholder. Having assumed the command of the combined forces, in July, 1792, he advanced from Coblentz to the heights of Valmy, where he was foiled by Dumouriez, and obliged to withdraw his army by forced marches, to their own frontier, destitute of provisions, encumbered with baggage, exposed to the ravages of a dreadful dysentery, and completely bereft of all its glory. In 1793, the Duke retired from the command of the Prussian army in disgust. On the breaking out of the war in 1806, the command was again confided to him. On the 13th of October, while reconnoitring the enemy at an advanced post, with a telescope in his hand, he was wounded in the face by a grape shot; and he was obliged soon after to have recourse to a litter, in which he was conducted to the capital of his dominions. On the approach of the enemy he left his little metropolis for the last time, and retired by easy journies to Altona. There, in an obscure lodging, attended by his consort, he heard that the royal family was fled; that nearly all his troops had been intercepted in their retreat; and that he himself was stripped of his dominions. In this melancholy situation, bereft of sight, overwhelmed with pain, and surrounded by misery, died a sovereign prince, to whose talents, at one critical period, all the sovereigns of Europe looked up for safety and protection. The Duke breathed his last on the 10th of November, in the 71st year of his age.

* The Duke of Berg, on the 15th of October invested Erfurth, and on the following day, that fine citadel, to which General Mollendorf had retreated, was surrendered, with 14,000 men, into the hands of the enemy. The blockade of Magdeberg, which, being supposed perfectly out of danger, had been made a depot for the most valuable effects from Munster, Cassel, and East Friesland, amounting to a very great accumulation, was entered on the 20th under the orders of the same commander, while he proceeded towards Spandau only three miles from Berlin. The garrison of this place surrendered on the 24th, and on the 8th of November, Magdeberg itself, with 22,000 prisoners, was yielded up to the enemy. Stettin, with a garrison of 6,000 men, and 100 pieces of cannon, was also taken by one of the wings of the Duke of Berg's corps, while the other attacked a column of 6,000 Prussians, who immediately laid down their arms. Stettin was the fortress to which, after the fatal day of Jena, the Prince of Hohenlohe directed his course with the principal wreck of the army, having under him about 16,000 infantry, principally guards and grenadiers, six regiments of cavalry, and 64 pieces of harnessed artillery. In his attempt, however, he was intercepted, and taken.

General Blucher, after the defeat at Jena, attempted to gain the Oder, to effect a junction with the army of Prince Hohenlohe. After various attempts, he received the mortifying intelligence that the prince had capitulated. General Blucher had now no alternative but to take the direction to Hamburg or Lubeck, or to fight the next day, as the Duke of Berg was on his left flank, Soult on his right, and Bernadotte on his front, each of whose divisions was more than double the number of his own. His march to Lubeck was accordingly resolved upon. Here treachery combined against him, and afforded aid to the French troops, who soon filled the town. The squares, streets, and even churches, were scenes of the most bloody conflict and carnage, war triumphed in this unfortunate place, in its full ravage; and the Prussian troops at length, obliged to yield to the superior forces of the enemy, withdrew from the town. Effectual resistance was now impossible. After three weeks, constant retreat, in which, from the incessant fatigue of marching five or six German miles a day, with only the most miserable means of subsistence, fifty or sixty men being frequently obliged to be left behind, he felt it his duty, at the moment the French were about to attack him, to yield to a capitulation.

Davoust had, on the 18th of October, taken possession of Leipzig, where immediate notice was given to the merchants and bankers, that all English property would be seized in this grand entrepot of British merchandise; and all persons were enjoined within twenty-four hours to send in a declaration regarding all such property in their possession, of whatever description; the non-compliance with this mandate to be punished by the summary process of military tribunals. Having ordered a bridge to be thrown over the Elbe at this place, Davoust proceeded to Wittemburg, and gained by surprise the bridges of that town, after which he moved forward to Berlin, which he entered at the head of his troops on the 25th, followed on the succeeding day by the corps of Marshal Augereau. On the 24th, Buonaparte arrived at Potsdam; where he visited the palace, and the tomb of the great Frederick. The sword of that distinguished warrior, the ribbon of the black eagle, the colours taken by him in the seven years' war, and the scarf which he used during that critical period of vicissitudes and glory, excited particular regard and emotion, and seizing these trophies, he exclaimed with transport, "Twenty millions shall not purchase them. I will present them to my old soldiers, and the Hotel of Invalids at Paris shall be their future depository." Within three days after his arrival at Potsdam, he made his public entry into Berlin, attended by his principal Generals, and his foot guards. Various ambassadors from the powers with which he was at peace were here presented to him at the palace. He afterwards received the deputies from the Lutheran and Reformed churches, mostly the descendants of the refugee French protestants, driven from their country by the revocation of the edict of Nantes, to whom he promised the continued enjoyment of their privileges and worship. Twelve hundred of the principal inhabitants were intrusted with the guardianship of the city; and to the management of eight of the highest reputation and consequence, was committed the superintendance of the police. The supreme provisional government of the conquered country of Prussia was divided into four departments—Berlin, Custin, Stettin, and Magdeburg, and committed to the direction of General Clarke.

† This edict, which afterwards became so memorable under the designation of the "Berlin Decree," was introduced by a declaration, stating, that England had violated the laws of nations in considering every individual belonging to a hostile state as an actual enemy, whether found on board vessels of merchandise, or engaged otherwise in the tranquil occupations of commercial agents, or as members of commercial factories. She had moreover extended her right of blockade beyond all reasonable limits—to places before which she had not a single ship of war, and even to whole coasts and kingdoms, where, with all her naval superiority, it was impossible for her actually to maintain it. The monstrous abuse of the right of blockade, as it was styled, had no other object but to impede the communication between nations, and to aggrandize the commerce and industry of England by the ruin of the commerce and industry of the Continent. All those who dealt in English commodities upon the Continent, might, therefore, be justly regarded as seconding those views, and rendering themselves her accomplices. And that, as it was a right, conferred by the laws of nature and of nations, to oppose to an enemy the weapons he employs against his adversary; it was there decreed, that till the English government should abandon this system, the British isles should be placed in a state of blockade, and all commerce and correspondence with her interdicted.

marches to the river Drzura. His reconnoitring parties, however, soon ascertained the great superiority and the rapid march of the enemy, on which General Bonningsen speedily retired across the Vistula, and entirely destroyed the bridge over that river. About the end of November, the first division of the French army arrived at Warsaw, and one of their first objects was to substitute a bridge for that which the Russians had destroyed. Buonaparte quitted Posen for Warsaw. After various operations, the battles of Maziesk and Lopackzin were fought on the 24th of December, in which the Russians lost 1600 men, and 25 pieces of cannon. A Prussian corps, consisting of 6,000 infantry, and 1,000 cavalry, also sustained a signal defeat at Scoldaw, by a corps of French troops under Marshal Ney; while Bessieres routed another detachment of Prussian troops, breaking their line, and driving them into the morasses, near the village of Carmeden. These successes were only preliminary to a battle of more importance, fought on the 26th of December, in the vicinity of Pultusk, and which closed the military operations of the year.*

The Prussian monarch, while these disastrous events were taking place, experienced a state of the utmost suspense and embarrassment. His queen and family, with a train of attendants and nobility, sought an asylum, first at Dantzic, and afterwards at Memel, where the death of one of the young princes was combined with other circumstances of public and domestic affliction.

A general armament was ordered by the Emperor of Russia to be raised, in a certain proportion to the existing population, according to which the force to be levied would amount to upwards of 600,000 men, who were, on any requisite emergency, to be ready to support the troops of the empire. By Buonaparte, on the other hand, levies were perpetually sent from the interior of France to the seat of war, and an anticipated conscription for the ensuing year was put in requisition, to be trained and disciplined.

Jerome Buonaparte was successfully conducting the operations of the army in Silesia. On the 8th of January, 1807, the city of Breslau, which had been for some time regularly besieged, surrendered to the enemy, who had begun to batter in breach; the magazines of this fortress were considerable, and its garrison, consisting of 5,500 men, defiled before Prince Jerome as his prisoners of war. The other fortresses in Silesia were in succession rapidly invested, and taken. In the mean time, the French armies were employed in prosecuting the sieges of Stralsund, Colberg, and Dantzic, the possession of the latter of which cities was deemed of extreme consequence.

Towards the end of January, Buonaparte quitted Warsaw, and joined his army. Various contests occurred early in the month of February, and the evening of the 6th came on while both armies were in presence of each other: during the night, the Russians retreated, and took up their position behind Eylau. At a short distance from this place there is a flat, at the summit of an eminence, which, as commanding the entrance into the town, it was deemed necessary by Buonaparte to gain. The Russian troops, who held this position, were thrown into considerable confusion, by an attack made upon them under the direction of Soult; but, by a well-timed and admirably-conducted charge from a body of the Russian cavalry, some of the French battalions thus employed were completely thrown into disorder. During this vicissitude of fortune, the result of which was the continued possession of the eminence by the Russians, the troops came to action in Eylau. Several regiments had been posted in a church and church-yard, which were maintained by the Russians, with extraordinary pertinacity, and occasioned on both sides the most dreadful carnage till about ten o'clock at night, when they were abandoned to the French. The division of Le Grand passed the night in front of the village; that of St. Hilaire was on the right; Augereau was posted on the left; the corps of Davoust began its march early on the ensuing morning of the 8th, with a view to fall on the left of the Russians; while that of Ney was on its march to outflank them on the right. At day-break the attack commenced, on the part of the Russians, by a cannonade, directed against the division of St. Hilaire. Buonaparte commanded in person at Eylau, and stationed himself at the church, which had been so obstinately defended the preceding day, whence he gave orders for the corps of Augereau to advance with forty pieces of cannon, and to cannonade the eminence which had before been unsuccessfully attempted. The Russian army was formed into columns, and being only at the distance of half a cannon shot from the assailants, every ball took effect. To terminate the carnage occasioned by this dreadful cannonade, the Russians attempted to surround the left wing of the enemy. The corps under Davoust were at this moment perceived by the Russian commander to be in a situation highly favourable to an attack, and stood exposed to the danger of being assailed by the whole force of the Russian army; to prevent the disaster that must inevitably have ensued, Augereau advanced in columns across the plain to attack the centre of the Russians, and thus to divide their attention. The division of St. Hilaire approached on the right, and was endeavouring to form a junction with Augereau: during the manœuvres necessary for effecting this object, a heavy fall of snow intercepted the view of the French divisions; their point of direction was lost; and the columns deviating to the left, were exposed for a considerable time to extreme uncertainty and danger. On the conclusion of the storm, which lasted for more than half an hour, the Grand Duke of Berg, immediately perceiving the destruction to which the French columns were exposed, and from which nothing but the boldest manœuvres could rescue them, instantly advanced at the head of his cavalry, with Marshal Bessieres and the imperial guard, to the support of St. Hilaire's division, and attacked the main body of the Russians: by this vigorous and unexpected movement the Russians were thrown into disorder, and sustained the most dreadful slaughter; two of their lines were penetrated, and the third was preserved entire only by the support derived from an adjoining wood. This splendid and successful operation was, however, by no means decisive of the fate of the day; the Russian army still resisted, with a firmness and perseverance which rendered the contest long doubtful: for twelve hours, 300 cannon were scattering death in every direction. The success of Davoust at length gave a preponderance to the scale on the side of the French army; his march had been retarded by several falls of snow, and the junction of his columns proved an affair of extreme difficulty; but at length he was enabled to out-flank the Russians, and to gain possession of the level on the summit of the eminence. This position was disputed with all the vigour and ardour of military combat; and after the Russians had been obliged in the first instance to abandon it, they attempted to recover their lost ground, with a vehemence bordering upon rage, and a perseverance approaching to desperation; their reiterated attempts were, however, found to be ineffectual, and they were obliged finally to quit the field, and to secure as orderly a retreat as possible.* The havoc resulting from this sanguinary contest, occasioned great exertions to be made for reinforcements. The Emperor Alexander and the Archduke Constantine not long after joined the Russian army with upwards of 60,000 troops; and the efforts of Napoleon to repair his loss, and accumulate a force equal to the great struggle which still remained, were unremitting. The greater part of the 8th corps of the grand army, which had been employed under General Mortier, in the north of Germany, was ordered to march to the more critical theatre of hostility; and from the different recruiting stations throughout France, and the conquered countries, reinforcements were continually dispatched to join the imperial standard on the Vistula.

* In the morning of that day Marshal Lannes arrived opposite to Pultusk, where the whole corps of General Benningsen had assembled during the night. About ten o'clock the next morning the attack was commenced by the French, and received by the Russians with great firmness. The battle was fought with great obstinacy, and with various vicissitudes, but at length French tactics triumphed over Russian courage, and General Benningsen, on whom the chief command of the Russian army had now devolved, was compelled to retreat. In the mean time, General Buxhoevden had assembled the different corps of his army at Golymin, to which place they were closely pursued by Davoust, who took up his position in an adjoining wood. About noon Augereau arrived, and took the Russians in the flank, while another French corps deprived them of a point of support, derived from a neighbouring village, and at three o'clock the division of General Hendelet formed in line, and advanced against the Russians. The fire was conducted with great animation, and notwithstanding several impetuous and successful charges made by the cavalry of the Duke of Berg, the contest continued till eleven o'clock at night; when the Russian commander, finding himself unable any longer to resist the shock, ordered a retreat to Ostrolenka. General Buxhoevden was now placed in a situation of extreme danger, and had not the unfavourable state of the roads impeded the progress of the French troops under Marshal Soult, scarcely any portion of the Russian army could have escaped destruction. The loss in these actions, on the part of the French, was admitted by themselves to be little short of 3,000 men; but that of the Russians was, on the same authority, stated to be 12,000 killed, wounded, and taken; 80 pieces of cannon; and about 1,200 baggage waggons. The retreat of the Russians was the signal for the French troops to enter into winter quarters, and the corps under Marshals Ney, Bernadotte, and Bessieres, were almost immediately cantoned on the left bank of the river Orege, while Marshal Soult, with the brigades of light horse, were stationed on the right bank of that river for their protection.

The French army now bent its efforts with increased vigour against the fortress of Dantzic. This place had been for some time invested, but the siege was now urged with extreme pressure and perseverance. On the 24th of April the bombardment began; but it was not till the 27th of May, that the garrison, reduced from 16,000 to 9,000 men, with their general at their head, marched out of the fortifications with all the honours of war, and were permitted to go wherever their inclination and convenience dictated, engaging only not to serve against France for the ensuing twelve months.†

After a system of violence and rapine had been sufficiently organized to proceed with little military impulse, in Hamburgh, Lubeck, and the various other places, which, in their turn, became the victims of imperial plunder, the corps of Mortier was ordered to proceed against Swedish Pomerania, and to co-operate with Lefebvre in the siege of Dantzic. The attempts of Buonaparte to detach the King of Sweden from the confederacy had been such as would have seduced or terrified to his purpose a man of less firmness and perseverance than were possessed by this young monarch. The failure of the overtures of the French government was, in January, followed by the seizure of Anclam. Grissewald was soon taken by the French troops, and Stralsund itself was invested. The Swedish army at Stralsund consisted of 13,000 Swedes, and 4,000 Prussians: these the King was almost in daily expectation of seeing joined by a considerable British force, which might qualify him to take the field for active operations against the enemy, instead of confining himself within the walls of a fortress. A force was not long after landed in Rugen and Stralsund, consisting of several thousand foreign troops, under a British commander, and constituting the first division of the expected armament; but the arrival of these reinforcements produced no immediate interest, and circumstances speedily occurred which materially changed the aspect of affairs.

Towards the close of the year 1806, war had been declared by Turkey against Russia; and to promote the success of the latter, and oblige the Turks to accede to terms of accommodation, by which a force would be released from this southern warfare, and enabled to swell the Russian army in Poland, a British fleet, under the command of Sir John Duckworth, advanced through the Dardanelles, and on the 20th of March appeared off Constantinople. Instead of producing accommodation between Russia and the Porte, a new power only was added to the list of England's enemies; commercial relations with Turkey were, of course, immediately closed; the British agents and settlers in the Turkish territories were exposed to considerable annoyance, and the seizure and sequestration of English property at Smyrna, Salonica, and other places, were ordered by the Porte, with a promptitude which precluded all opportunity for precaution. The power of France over the divan became materially strengthened; Sebastiani, the French ambassador at Constantinople, was consulted on almost every emergency, and his influence in the Turkish capital became predominant and irresistible. In this war between Russia and the Porte, the former, however, was generally successful, and to add to the disasters of the Turks, an insurrection arose during its progress, owing to some new regulations in the dress and discipline of the troops, which terminated in the deposition and violent death of the Grand Seignior, Selim III. and the proclamation of Mustapha IV. By sea, the Russians were equally successful as by land, and in an engagement between the Russian and Turkish fleets, fought on the 1st of July, near the entrance to the Dardanelles, the Turkish squadron, consisting of eleven sail of the line, was nearly annihilated. Circumstances, however, occurred, which speedily led to a termination of the contest.

Subsequently to the battle of Eylau, and during the siege of Dantzic, no exertions were omitted by Buonaparte which could add security to his positions. The surrender of Dantzic added considerably to the disposable force of the French, but did not appear to offer any immediate and effectual inducement to Buonaparte to quit his almost impregnable positions. Two mighty armies, however, when the season was favourable to their operations, could not be long, nearly in view of each other, without coming to the alternative of pacification, or sanguine and destructive hostility; and as the confidence still entertained by each party prevented any successful attempts at negociation, circumstances soon occurred which drew on an obstinate and decisive conflict. On the 5th of June the grand French army was attacked by the allies at different points of their line. On the right of the allies, and the left of the French, twelve Russian and Prussian regiments, forming two divisions, attacked the tete du pont of Spanden, on the Passarge, which was defended by a regiment of light infantry, strongly covered by intrenchments and redoubts. Seven different times they were repulsed, and as often renewed the attack. But immediately after the last assault, they were charged by a regiment of French dragoons, that had come up to the assistance of the regiment of infantry, and forced to abandon the field of battle, with a severe loss of killed and wounded. Two divisions, belonging to the centre of the allied army, attacked, at the same time, the tete du pont of Lomitten, which was defended by a brigade of a corps of Marshal Soult; and after a gallant struggle, the Russian General, with 1,100 of his troops, fell in the action, which terminated in favour of the French. At the same time, General Benningsen, with the Grand Duke Constantine, the imperial guard, and three divisions of the other troops, attacked the French line at Aldkirken, Gutstadt, and Wolfsdorf, and after a severe contest, obliged the French General to fall back to Akendorf. On the following day, the allies attacked the 6th corps of the French army, under the command of Marshal Soult and General Marchand, at Deppen, on the Passarge. The Russians, in the action of this day, lost 2,000 killed, and more than 8,000 wounded, while the loss of the French, according to their own statement, was comparatively trivial.

After various manœuvres and skirmishes, the French army, on the 10th, moved towards Heilsberg, and on its advance to this place, came up with the rear-guard of the allied army, consisting of from 15 to 18,000 ca-

* The battle of Eylau appears to have been one of the most vigorous and obstinately contested battles in the history of the war; it was celebrated at Warsaw and at Paris, with the usual accompaniments of triumph: the loss of the Russians was stated in the French bulletin at 14,000 killed and wounded, and 12,000 prisoners; 45 pieces of cannon, and 18 colours; and that Buonaparte, neither in this, nor in any other battle where he commanded, ever lost any cannon. The loss of the French was admitted to be very severe, and General Benningsen estimates that loss at 30,000 killed, 12,000 wounded, and 2,000 prisoners!

† Dantzic, at the time of its surrender, possessed 800 pieces of artillery, and magazines and stores of every description. Its principal advantage, however, to the conqueror, lay in its constituting a place of the first order, for strength, on the left wing of the grand army, while the centre was supported by Thorne, and the right by Praga.

valry, and several lines of infantry. An attack was immediately commenced by a division of the French dragoons, and a brigade of light cavalry. The French were repeatedly repulsed, but as often renewed the attack. Reinforcements of both infantry and cavalry were sent to the rear-guard from the main body of the Russian army, which was posted at Heilsberg, and repeated efforts were made by the Russians, supported by more than 60 pieces of cannon, to maintain their position before that town; but all their exertions proved unavailing, and at nine o'clock in the evening, the French troops found themselves under the Russian intrenchments. The fusileers of the French guard, commanded by Savary, were put in motion to sustain the division of Verdier; and some of the corps of infantry of the reserve, under Marshal Lannes, attacked the Russians at the close of the day, and succeeded in cutting off their communication with Lansberg. Buonaparte passed the 11th on the field, in front of Heilsberg. He there drew up the different corps and divisions of the army in order of battle, that the war might be terminated at once by a decisive engagement. The grand army of the Russians was assembled at this place, where the magazines were established, and where they occupied a position strong by nature, and further strengthened by the labours of four months. At four in the afternoon, Buonaparte ordered Marshal Davoust to charge in front, and push forward the left wing of his corps—a movement which brought him upon the Lower Alla, and blocked up the road from Eylau. To every corps of the army was assigned its proper station, and thus the Russians found themselves blockaded in their intrenched camp, and offered battle on the ground which they themselves had chosen. At the moment when the French were making their dispositions, the Russians shewed themselves ranged in columns in the midst of their intrenchments; but at ten o'clock at night they began to pass the Alla, abandoned the whole of the country to their left, and left their magazines and wounded to the disposal of the enemy. In the different actions, from the 5th to the 12th, according to the French accounts, the Russian army was deprived of about 30,000 fighting men; the number of wounded, left prisoners in the hands of the enemy, amounted to between 3 and 4,000, while the loss of the French, as stated by themselves, amounted to no more than 700 killed, 2,200 wounded, and 300 prisoners.

On the 12th, at four in the morning, the French army entered Heilsberg, where they found in the magazines several thousand quintals of grain, and an immense quantity of different kinds of provisions. A division of dragoons, and a brigade of light cavalry, pursued the Russians to the right bank of the Alla. In the mean time, the light corps of the French army advanced in various directions, in order to pass the Russians, and, by cutting off their retreat to Koningsberg, to place themselves between the Russian army and their magazines. At five o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, the French army had advanced to Eylau, and taken up their head-quarters at that place. Here the fields were no longer covered with ice and snow, but on the contrary presented one of the most beautiful scenes in nature. On the 13th, while the Grand Duke of Berg, and the Marshals Soult and Davoust, had orders to manœuvre before Koningsberg, Buonaparte, with the corps of Ney, Lannes, Mortier, the imperial guard, and the first corps, commanded by General Victor, advanced to Friedland. On the same day, the 9th regiment of hussars entered that town, but was driven out of it again by 3,000 Russian cavalry. On the 14th, the anniversary of the battle of Marengo, the grand struggle took place. The field of battle lay between the left of the village of Heinrichdorff and the Alla, to the south of Friedland. Buonaparte, having reconnoitred the position of the enemy, determined to attempt the town of Friedland; and having changed his front, ordered the extremity of the right wing, under Marshal Ney, to advance to the attack. At half past five in the morning the battle commenced; the firing of twenty cannon from a battery forming the signal of attack. At that moment, the division under General Marchand, co-operating with Marshal Ney, advanced sword in hand. When the Russians observed Ney to have quitted the wood by which he had been supported, they endeavoured to turn his left by several regiments of cavalry, preceded by a multitude of Cossacks, but owing to the firmness of the dragoons of Latour Maubourg, they were repulsed. At this period of the battle, the Russian cavalry made an impetuous and successful attack upon the enemy's cuirassiers, and pursued them as far as Heinrichdorff. In the mean time, a battery was erected by General Victor, in his centre, and pushed on 400 paces by General Lennermont, to the extreme annoyance of the Russians, and which, by attracting their attention to its destructive fire, deranged those manœuvres, which might otherwise have defeated the operations of Ney. The Russian troops which attacked the right wing of this General were received upon the point of the bayonet, and driven into the river Alla, where thousands perished in the stream, while numbers escaped by swimming. When the left wing of Ney, however, had nearly reached the works which surrounded the town, it was exposed to the most imminent peril. The imperial Russian guard, which had been here concealed in ambuscade, suddenly advanced upon the French, with an impetuosity which threw them into disorder, and had nearly rendered the efforts of the marshal abortive. The division of Dupont, however, which formed the right of the reserve, marched against the Russian guard, who performed prodigies of firmness and valour, but were unable to resist this effort of the enemy; several other bodies were sent from the centre of the Russian army for the defence of the position of Friedland; but the town was at length taken, and its streets filled with the bodies of the dead. The centre, under Marshal Lannes, was now engaged, and the Russians made several attempts against this corps, similar to those which had failed on the right wing; but the repeated efforts of the Russian bravery were unavailing, and served only to continue for a longer period the work of carnage. The battle lasted from half past five in the morning till seven at night. Both sides fought with extreme intrepidity and obstinacy, and the superior number of the French, with an impetuous direction of nearly all their force, towards the close of the day, upon the centre of the Russians, decided the fate of the contest. The Russians estimated their own loss at no less than 10,000 men. In eleven days the Russians lost 27 Generals, upwards of 1,800 officers killed and wounded, and 40,000 men. On the part of the French, according to their own self-evidently false account, the loss did not exceed 500 killed, and 300 wounded. Eighty pieces of cannon, a great number of caissons, and several colours, fell into the hands of the conquerors. Night did not prevent the pursuit of the Russians, who were followed till eleven o'clock, after which, those of the columns which were cut off endeavoured to avail themselves of the fords over the Alla to pass that river, which exhibited to the victors, on the ensuing day, marks of the total discomfiture of the allied army. On the 15th the Russians continued their retreat to Wehlau, at the confluence of the Alla and the Pregel, where the columns of the French speedily arrived, and obliged them to withdraw to the banks of the Niemen. Near this river several newly formed divisions of the Russian troops had arrived; and General Benningsen still cherished the expectation that he should soon be again able to advance and to recover from the enemy the advantages which he had obtained. This expectation was however grievously disappointed, for on the 18th of June, the retreating army approached the town of Tilsit, and after transporting its heavy baggage across the Niemen, stationed itself on the great plain on the right of the town. All the bridges were destroyed immediately after the passage of the Russian troops, and all the magazines on the Alla were burnt or cast into the river.

On the 16th Buonaparte threw a bridge over the Pregel, and took up a position on the eastern side of that river with his army. The defeat of Friedland served as a signal for the evacuation of Koningsberg, and the garrison under General Lestoq succeeded, with extreme difficulty, in joining the main body of the Russian army, while the fortress opened its gates on the 16th to the French corps under Marshal Soult. At this place were found several hundred thousand quintals of corn, more than 20,000 wounded Russians and Prussians, and all the arms and ammunition that had been sent to the Russians by England, including 160,000 muskets that had not been landed. On the 19th, at two o'clock in the afternoon, Buonaparte, with his guard, entered Tilsit. The Russians, pursued after the battle of Friedland by the Grand Duke of Berg, at the head of the greater part of the light cavalry, continued their retreat eastward. The Emperor of Russia, who had remained for three weeks with his Prussian Majesty at Tilsit, left that place along with the King in great haste; and on the same day a suspension of hostilities was proposed to the chiefs of the French army by the Russian Commander-in-chief. In consequence of this proposition an armistice was concluded at Tilsit, on the 22d, by which it was settled, that hostilities should not be resumed on either side without a month's previous notice; that a similar armistice should be concluded between the French and the Prussian armies, in the course of five days; that plenipotentiaries should be instantly appointed by the different parties, for the work of pacification, and that there should be an immediate exchange of prisoners.

Three days afterwards, an interview took place on the Niemen, between the Emperor Alexander and Buonaparte: at one o'clock, the latter, accompanied by a number of his Generals, embarked on the banks of the Niemen in a boat prepared for the purpose. They proceeded to the middle of the river, where General Lariboissiere, commanding the artillery of the guard, had caused a raft to be placed and a pavilion erected upon it, close to which was another raft and pavilion for his Majesty's suite. At the same moment the Emperor Alexander set out from the right bank, accompanied by the Grand Duke Constantine, General Benningsen, and a number of the principal officers of his staff. The two boats arrived at the same instant, and Buonaparte and the Emperor embraced each other as soon as they set foot on the raft. They entered the saloon together, and remained there two hours. The conference having terminated, the parties embarked, each in his boat, and returned to the opposite shores.

While arrangements were making for the preliminaries of peace, the town of Tilsit became the abode of the Emperor Alexander, the King of Prussia, and Buonaparte. The arrangements of pacification were at length completed; on the 9th of July a treaty of peace between Russia and France was ratified; and, on the same day peace was signed between France and Prussia.* The King of Sweden refused to accede to the treaty of Tilsit, and attempted the defence of Pomerania; but being abandoned to his fate by his continental allies, his efforts were unavailing. He, however, succeeded in withdrawing his forces from Stralsund before the enemy was apprised of his intention, after which he crossed the Baltic and returned into Sweden.

It is now time to revert to the proceedings of the British Parliament, which had been opened, by commission, on the 15th of December, 1806. The object of the royal speech was to prepare the nation for the awful crisis impending, and to animate them to adequate exertions against the formidable and increasing power of the enemy.† The address, moved in the Lords by the Earl of Jersey, and seconded by Lord Somers; and in the Commons by the Honourable Mr. Lambe, and seconded by Mr. John Smyth, called forth various observations from Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. Canning, but was passed in both Houses without a division.‡ On the 2d of January, the subject of the late negociation with France for the restoration of a general peace was brought under the consideration of the House of Lords. The discussion was introduced by Lord Grenville, in a speech of considerable length, the leading points of which were embraced in the following motion: "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, to assure him that this House has taken into its serious consideration the papers relative to the late negociation, which he has been graciously pleased to lay before them, and that they see with gratitude, that he has employed every means to restore the blessings of peace, in a manner consistent with the interest and glory of his people, and at the same time with an observance of that good faith with our allies, which this country is bound to maintain inviolate. That while we lament that, by the unbounded ambition of the enemy, those laudable endeavours have been frustrated, no exertions shall be wanting on our part to support and assist his Majesty in the adoption of such measures as may be found necessary, either for the restoration of peace, or to meet the various exigencies of the war in this most important crisis." Lord Hawkesbury and Lord Eldon expressed their complete concurrence in the leading points of the address, but contended that there was no proof, that the French government had agreed to proceed on the basis of the uti possidetis, or state of actual possession. They most heartily acquiesced in the result of the negociation, and with this exception, joined in the address, which was carried nemine contradicente. On the 5th of January the same subject was brought under discussion in the

* By this treaty Prussia was deprived of all her territories on the left bank of the Elbe, and of all her Polish provinces, except those situated between Pomerania and the Newmarke, and ancient Prussia, to the north of the little river Netz. The elector, now become the King of Saxony, in virtue of a treaty entered into with Napoleon Buonaparte, took also the title of Duke of Warsaw, and was to have free communication, by a military road, between Saxony and his new dominions, which were to consist of Thorn, Warsaw, and the rest of Prussian Poland, except that part which is to the north of the Bug, and which, under the idea of establishing natural boundaries between Russia and the duchy of Warsaw, was incorporated with the dominions of the Emperor Alexander. Dantzic was in future to be an independent town: East Friesland was added to the kingdom of Holland: a new kingdom, under the designation of the kingdom of Westphalia, was formed of the provinces ceded by the Prussian Monarch, and others in the possession of Buonaparte. The recognition of Jerome Buonaparte, as the sovereign of this new state, also of the Kings of Holland and Naples, and of all the present and future members of the confederation of the Rhine, was yielded to on the part of Prussia, with the consent to close her ports and become a party in the maritime war against England. By the publication of the treaty with Russia, it appeared that the Emperor and Buonaparte mutually guaranteed to each other the integrity of their possessions, and of those of the other powers included in the treaty. The Kings of Holland, Naples, and Westphalia, were to be recognized by Russia; the offer of a mediation to effect a peace between France and England was accepted, on the condition that, within one month from the ratification, England should admit this mediation. It was also stipulated that hostilities should immediately cease between Russia and the Ottoman Porte; and the Emperor of Russia agreed to accept the mediation of Buonaparte for the conclusion of peace between the two powers. The independence of Dantzic; the military high-way between Saxony and the Duchy of Warsaw; the annexation of part of Prussian Poland to the empire of Russia, formed also articles in the Prussian treaty. The restoration of the Dukes of Saxe Cobourg, Oldenburg, and Mecklenburg Schwerin, to the quiet possession of their dominions, was acceded to by France. The confederation of the Rhine was explicitly acknowledged by the Emperor of Russia; who engaged equally to acknowledge the princes or states that might hereafter be added to this union, on the communication of such change by the French government.

† His Majesty acquainted his Parliament, that his efforts for the restoration of general tranquillity, on terms consistent with the interest and honour of his people, and good faith to his allies, had been disappointed by the ambition and injustice of the enemy, who in the same moment had kindled up a fresh war in Europe, and of which the progress had been attended with the most calamitous events. Prussia, threatened by the near approach of that danger, which she had vainly hoped to avert by so many sacrifices, was at length compelled to adopt the resolution of openly resisting the unremitting system of aggrandizement and conquest pursued by France; but neither this determination nor the succeeding measures of hostility were previously concerted with his Majesty; nor had any disposition been shown to offer any adequate satisfaction for those aggressions which had placed this country in a state of hostility with Prussia. Yet, in this situation, his Majesty did not hesitate to adopt, without delay, such measures as were calculated to unite their councils and interests against the common enemy. The speech extolled the good faith of his Majesty's remaining allies; and concluded with a solemn appeal to the bravery and public spirit of his people.

‡ On the 22d of December, the unanimous thanks of both Houses were voted to Major-General Sir John Stuart, and also to the Hon. Brigadier-Generals Cole and Ackland, for the distinguished ability and valour manifested by them in the signal victory obtained over the French troops at Maida, on the 4th of July, 1806, and to the officers under their command; as well as to the non-commissioned officers and private soldiers serving under the same, for their bravery and good conduct in the glorious battle of Maida.

Commons, on the motion of Lord Howick, when Mr. Whitbread moved the following amendment:—"To assure his Majesty of our firm determination to co-operate with his Majesty in calling forth the resources of the united kingdom, for the vigorous prosecution of the war in which we are involved, and to pray his Majesty, that he will, in his paternal goodness, afford, as far as is consistent with his own honour, and the interest of his people, every facility to any just arrangement by which the blessing of peace may be restored to his loyal subjects." This amendment was afterwards withdrawn, and the address was carried without a division. On the 29th of the month, Lord Henry Petty, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, brought forward a statement of the supplies of the ways and means for the year, combined with a permanent plan of finance, which professed to have for its object to provide the means of maintaining the honour and independence of the British empire, during the necessary continuance of the war, without perceptibly increasing the burthens of the country, and with manifest benefit to the interest of the public creditor. The total amount of the supplies for the year 1807, he stated at 40,527,065*l.* 11s. 8d. and the ways and means at 41,100,000*l. The favourable impression made by the new method of supply (which was agreed to) was immediately obvious upon the funds, which advanced considerably, and gave the minister an opportunity of negociating a loan on terms highly advantageous to the public, and yet not unproductive to the contractors.

On the 9th of February, Mr. Whitbread moved for permission to bring a bill into the House of Commons for amending the condition of the poor in England; but this measure, with some others, was interrupted in its progress by the change of administration, and the concomitant dissolution of Parliament. In the new Parliament it was again taken into consideration, and the bill was passed through the House of Commons; it was, however, ultimately doomed to a fate which so enlightened a measure did not merit; and on the 11th of August the bill was, on the motion of Lord Hawkesbury, thrown out of the House of Peers. The labours of this Parliament, and of this ministry, closed gloriously, with the final abolition of the Slave trade.† The dismissal of ministers was occasioned by their pertinacious support of the Catholic claims. On the 5th of March, a bill had been brought into the House of Commons by Lord Howick, which, without having for its object what was called the emancipation of the Catholics, was adapted to afford them great satisfaction, and was doubtless intended as the precursor of a system of enlarged toleration, which contemplated the removal of all the disabilities under which the Catholic and Protestant Dissenters of the united kingdom laboured. It soon, however, became a matter of notoriety, that objections to this bill existed in a quarter to which the public naturally looked up with respect and deference. His Majesty, who had already gone far beyond all his predecessors in regard to religious toleration, and particularly in concessions to his Roman Catholic subjects, having maturely considered the nature and extent of the bill, regarded it as contrary to the obligations of his coronation oath, and the principles of the British constitution. Under such circumstances, ministers found it necessary to abandon the measure, and it was required from them to give a written obligation, pledging themselves never more to propose any thing connected with the Catholic question. This demand they resisted, as incompatible with their honour and duty. Some portion of irritation now operated in both parties; the breach had extended too far to admit of being closed; confidence was mutully impaired; and the necessary consequence, the resignation of ministers, almost immediately ensued. After a period of suspense and agitation, the names of the new ministers were announced on the 25th of March.‡ A trial of strength between the newly appointed and the late ministers speedily took place in the House of Commons, on a motion deprecating

* The new plan of finance was adapted to meet a scale of expenditure nearly equal to that of the year 1806; and assumed, that during the war, the annual produce of the permanent and temporary revenue would continue equal to the produce of that year. Keeping these premises in view, it was proposed that the war loans for the years 1807, 1808, and 1809, should be 12,000,000*l.* annually; for this year, 1810, 14,000,000*l.* and for each of the ten following years 16,000,000*l.* Those several loans, amounting in the fourteen years to 210,000 000*l.* were to be made a charge on the war taxes, which were estimated to produce 21,000,000*l.* annually. The charge thus thrown on the war taxes was meant to be at the rate of ten per cent. upon each loan. Every such loan would therefore pledge so much of the war taxes as would be sufficient to meet this charge: that is, a loan of 12,000,000*l.* would be pledged for 1,200,000*l.* of the war taxes. And in each year, if the war should be continued, a further proportion of the war taxes would in the same manner be pledged. And consequently, at the end of fourteen years, if the war should be of that duration, 21,000,000*l.* the whole produce of the war taxes, would be pledged for the total of the loans, which would at that time have amounted to 210,000,000*l.* The ten per cent charge thus accompanying each loan, would be applied to pay the interest of the loan, and to form a sinking fund, which sinking fund would evidently be more than five per cent. on such of the several loans as should be obtained on a less rate of interest than five per cent. As a five per cent. sinking fund, accumulating at compound interest, would redeem any sum of capital debt in fourteen years, the several proportions of the war taxes, proposed to be pledged for the several loans abovementioned, would have redeemed their respective loans, and be successively liberated, in periods of fourteen years from the date of each such loan. The portions of war taxes thus liberated might, if the war should still be prolonged, become applicable in a revolving series, and might be again pledged for new loans; it was, however, material, that the property tax should not be pledged beyond the period for which it was granted, but should, in every case, cease on the 6th of April next after the ratification of a definitive treaty of peace. In the result therefore of the whole measure, there would not be imposed any new taxes for the first three years from this time. New taxes of less than 300,000*l.* on an average of seven years, from 1810 to 1816, both inclusive, were all that would be necessary, in order to procure for the country the full benefit and advantage of the plan here described, which would continue for twenty years: during the last ten of which again no new taxes whatever would be required.

† Lord Grenville, on the 2d of January, brought in a bill for the total Abolition of the African Slave Trade, which was read a first time, and printed. On the 4th of February, counsel were heard at the bar of the House in favour of the continuance of the trade, and on the following day, Lord Grenville concluded an elaborate speech on the subject, by moving that "the bill be now read a second time." The motion was supported by the Duke of Gloucester, the Bishop of Durham, the Earls Moira, Selkirk, and Roslyn, and the Lords Holland, King, and Hood. The opponents of the bill were the Duke of Clarence, the Earls Westmoreland and St. Vincent, and the Lords Sidmouth, Eldon, and Hawkesbury. At four o'clock in the morning the House divided, when there appeared for the motion 100; and against it, 36 voices. On the 10th the bill was read a third time, and having passed, it was ordered to the Commons for the concurrence of that assembly. On the 23d, Lord Howick moved for the commitment of the bill, and was supported by Mr. Lushington, Mr. Fawkes, Lord Mahon, Lord Milton, Sir John Doyle, Sir Samuel Romilly, Mr. Wilberforce, and Earl Percy, the last of whom wished that a clause might be introduced into the bill by which all the children of slaves born after January 1810, should be made free. General Gascoyne and Mr. Hibbert opposed the bill; Mr. Hiley Addington preferred a plan for gradual abolition. There appeared on a division, for the question 283, and against it only 16 voices. The bill, which was debated with great animation in all its stages, enacted, that no vessel should clear out for slaves from any port within the British dominions after the 1st of May, 1807, and that no slave should be landed in the colonies after the 1st of March, 1808. On the 16th of March, on the motion of Lord Henry Petty, the bill was read a third time, and passed without a division. On the 18th, Lord Howick, accompanied by Mr. Wilberforce and others, carried the bill to the Lords for their concurrence in certain amendments that had been introduced. Lord Grenville instantly moved that it should be printed, and taken into consideration on the 23d. The reason of this haste was, that his Majesty, displeased with the introduction of the Roman Catholic officers' bill into the House of Commons, had resolved to displace the existing administration. On the 23d, the Lords met, and the amendments were adopted without a division.

Though the bill had passed both Houses, there was an awful fear, lest it should not receive the royal assent before the ministry was dissolved. On Wednesday, the 25th of March, at half-past eleven o'clock in the morning, his Majesty's message was delivered to the different members of administration, commanding them to wait upon him, to deliver up the seals of their respective offices. It then appeared, that a commission for the royal assent to this bill, among others, had been obtained. This commission was instantly opened by the Lord Chancellor (Erskine), who was accompanied by the Lords Holland and Auckland; and as the clock struck twelve, this important bill became, after a struggle of 20 years, a part of the law of the land!

ing ministerial pledges. The majority on the part of ministers, only amounted, in a House of 484 members, to 32; and Mr. Canning intimated, that in the event of administration finding any impediment, from the numbers of their opponents, a dissolution of Parliament would be resorted to. This threat was soon after carried into effect; and on the 27th of April the session and the Parliament were brought to an end by a speech from the throne, in which the commissioners were charged to state, "that his Majesty was anxious to recur to the sense of his people, while the events which had recently taken place were yet fresh in their recollection."

The ensuing elections were, in many places, very violently contested;* and, of the late ministry, Mr. Thomas Grenville was the only Commoner in the cabinet, who, at the assembly of the new Parliament, resumed his situation for the place he had represented.

Russia being at this time engaged in a war with the Porte by the instigation of France, it was incumbent upon England to attempt an accommodation of the existing differences, and to prevent, if possible, the direction of the strength of her ally towards the south of Europe. For this purpose, negociations were entered into with the cabinet of Constantinople, and Admiral Sir John Duckworth was instructed to proceed, with seven sail of the line, a frigate, and two sloops, to force the Dardanelles, and bombard the Turkish capital, if certain terms should not be acceded to by that government. On the 19th of February, the British Admiral proceeded to force the passage. The fire of the enemy from the outer castles inflicted but little injury on his ships; but in the narrow passage of Sestos and Abydos, a very heavy cannonade was directed from both castles, within point-blank shot of each other, which opened their fire on the English ships as they continued to pass in succession. The spirited return made to this fire considerably diminished its force, and prevented the sternmost ships from receiving any material injury. A small Turkish squadron, consisting of a sixty-four gun ship, four frigates, and several corvettes, at anchor to the north-east of the castles, was attacked by Sir Sidney Smith, and driven on shore, where it was destroyed; while the guns of a formidable battery at Point Pesquies, were spiked by a detachment of marines. On the evening of the 20th the squadron anchored near Prince's Islands, about eight miles from the city. The negociations between Mr. Arbuthnot, the British ambassador to the Porte, who was then on board Admiral Duckworth's fleet, and the Turkish government, continued till the 27th, and in the interval, such was the unfortunate state of the weather, it was not at any time in the power of the British Admiral to occupy such a situation as would have enabled him to commence offensive operations. At length it became necessary to terminate an exhibition thus humiliating. The time which had been occupied by the English commander in empty menaces, had been employed by the Turks in the most active repairs and preparations. The whole line of the coast now presented a chain of batteries. Twelve line of battle ships were ready, with their sails bent, and filled with troops; an innumerable multitude of small craft, with fire vessels, had been collected; and near 200,000 troops, meant to march against the Russians, were said to be in Constantinople. Had the weather favoured an attack, these accumulated means of resistance by the enemy must have been attended with a doubtful issue to the British squadron; and even had Sir John Duckworth overcome all this opposition, the re-passage of the Dardanelles was still requisite to complete his triumph. The idea of waiting for a wind to bombard the city was therefore now abandoned; and wounded, as the British commander acknowledged himself to have been, in pride and in ambition, he weighed anchor on the 1st of March, and by the next day, before noon, every ship under his command had cleared the passage of the Dardanelles. This escape, however, was only from destruction, by no means from serious loss and injury. The fire of the inner castles, which had been severe in the first passage, was more than doubly formidable on the return. The Windsor Castle was struck by a granite shot of 800 pounds weight; and the number of killed and wounded, which in the first instance had not been considerable, was swelled to nearly 300 men. The damage done to most of the ships, in their hulls, masts, and rigging, was very severe, and the expedition was productive of nothing but disaster and humiliation. Whilst Admiral Duckworth was advancing to Constantinople, an English expedition was proceeding towards another point of the Turkish dominions. On the 6th of March, a detachment, consisting of about 5000 men, under the command of General Fraser, was embarked at Messina, in forty-nine transports, for the purpose of taking possession of Alexandria; and on the 16th, they came to anchor before that city. On the morning of the 19th, the British commander occupied the spot rendered memorable by the victory under Abercrombie; and on the 21st, General Fraser took possession of the place, in virtue of a capitulation executed by Seid Mohamed Naim Effendi, on behalf of his excellency Emen Bey, the governor. Major General Wauchope, with a detachment of 1500 men, consisting of the 31st regiment, and chasseurs Britanniques, was then dispatched to take possession of Rosetta and Rhamanie, under the persuasion that the possession of these places was necessary, to prevent the inhabitants of Alexandria from being exposed to the horrors of famine. The troops dispatched on this service encountered no opposition on their march towards Rosetta, and the heights of Abourmandour, which command that city, were occupied without any loss. Instead of retaining possession of this post, General Wauchope was induced, without any previous examination, to enter the town with his whole force. Here he found, to his surprise, that preparation

* For Westminster the Candidates were, Mr. Paull, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Elliot, and Lord Cochrane. Lord Cochrane was returned with Sir Francis Burdett, who during the whole election stood at the head of the poll, though he had declined to offer himself as a candidate, and was, in fact, at that time confined to his house, by a wound received in a duel with Mr. Paull. The latter gentleman, it appeared, without the authority, and even without the knowledge of Sir Francis, had caused an advertisement to be inserted in the public papers, announcing that Sir Francis would preside at a public dinner, connected with arrangements respecting the choice or nomination of proper persons for the representation of Westminster. The surprise and indignation of Sir Francis at the appearance of such an advertisement were considerable. He immediately communicated these feelings to Mr. Paull, by express, and peremptorily declined the honour intended him. Irritated by this refusal, Mr. Paull repaired to the residence of Sir Francis Burdett, at Wimbledon, at midnight, and conducted himself so as to produce a duel, in which, at the second fire, both parties were wounded, Mr. Paull in the leg, and Sir Francis in the thigh. The public unanimously agreed in censuring Mr. Paull for indecorum and brutality; and the consequence was, not merely the loss of his election, but his entire extinction as a public character. Some time afterwards, his finances being in a ruined state, he terminated his physical life by an act of suicide.

paration had been made for his reception. The Turks and Albanians, in great numbers, had posted themselves in various buildings and advantageous situations; and from every window and roof in the streets through which the British troops marched, they were assailed by such a severe fire of musquetry, that they were obliged at length to evacuate the place, with a loss of 300 men killed and wounded. The commander himself was among the slain; and Brigadier-General Meade, on whom the command now devolved, was severely wounded in the retreat. In this trying situation, to which the troops were thus rashly exposed, they conducted themselves with the most admirable courage and discipline, and succeeded in effecting their retreat to Aboukir, whence they soon after returned to Alexandria. Provisions were now become extremely scarce in this place, and the representations of Major Missett, the British president, on the necessity of taking Rosetta, were corroborated by the Sorbagi or chief magistrate of Alexandria, who stated that famine must be the inevitable consequence if this measure were not promptly executed. Another corps, amounting to about 2,500 men, under Brigadier-General Stewart, was accordingly dispatched on this service. On the 9th of April this force took post opposite the Alexandrian gate of Rosetta, and began to form their batteries. From the great extent of the town, it was found impossible that the small British army sent on that service could invest more than one half of it; and a line was in consequence taken up from the Nile to the front of the Alexandrian gate, thence retiring towards the plain where the dragoons were posted. A mortar and some guns were brought into play early in the afternoon; these were answered by the shouts of the Albanians from their walls; and by the incessant discharges of musquetry through the loop-holes and crevices, which were innumerable. From the 12th to the 20th, the operations against the city were prosecuted with much vigour. Great damage was done to the town, and not fewer than 300 shells, from mortars alone, were thrown into it. During all this time General Stewart was in daily and almost hourly expectation of assistance from the Mamelukes; but after waiting for this promised assistance till the 21st, a resolution was taken on the evening of that day, to retire from before Rosetta on the following morning. Early in the morning of the 22d, Colonel Macleod, who had been dispatched to defend the post of Hamet, informed the General that sixty or seventy large vessels, full of hostile troops, were descending the Nile. The danger was now alarming, and not a moment was to be lost. Orders were immediately dispatched to the Colonel to abandon his position, and return to the main body; but these orders were most unfortunately intercepted. General Stewart himself immediately withdrew, with his army formed in a hollow square, taking with him all the cannon and ammunition which the circumstances of the case would permit. The British troops, impressed with the exigencies of their situation, kept the most compact order, and presented in each direction so formidable a front, that the pursuers, with all their superiority of numbers, and impetuosity of attack, found them impervious to all their assaults. The detachment at Hamet, however, was completely cut off, and the whole loss in killed, wounded, and missing, from the commencement of the expedition under General Stewart, consisted of upwards of a thousand men. This succession of disasters made a strong impression on the public mind. Happily, however, the anticipations entertained of a famine at Alexandria were not verified. For several months the British troops remained in possession of that city, and although Rosetta was not added to their conquests, provisions became daily more plentiful. Preparations, however, were making at Cairo, upon a large scale, to effect their expulsion; and on the 8th of August, the governor of Egypt, at the head of a formidable force of infantry and cavalry, advanced towards Alexandria. Various circumstances induced General Fraser to abandon the idea of defence. On the approach of the enemy to the town, he sent a flag of truce, announcing, that on condition of the British prisoners being delivered up, the army under his command should immediately evacuate Egypt. This condition was accepted with as little hesitation as it was made. The English force almost immediately embarked, and on the 22d of September the crescent again waved on the towers of Alexandria.

Intelligence of the enterprise against Buenos Ayres, was received in June, 1806; but it was not till October, that a reinforcement was sent from England to cooperate with the troops under General Beresford in Maldonado. The command of the troops was given to Sir Samuel Auchmuty, and Sir Charles Stirling was appointed to convoy the transports in the Ardent ship of war, and on their arrival at La Plata to supersede Sir Home Popham. On the 5th of January this force arrived at Maldonado. An attack on Monte Video was determined upon, and on the morning of the 18th a landing was effected in a small bay on the coast. The enemy, who were in possession of the surrounding heights in great force, suffered the troops to disembark, and to take possession of a strong post about nine miles from the town, without opposition. On the 19th the army moved towards Monte Video. Two heights, in the front and to the left, were occupied by about four thousand of the enemy's horse, and a heavy fire of round and grape shot was now opened; but by a spirited charge from the light battalion under Colonel Brownrigg, the corps opposed to him was dispersed, and one of its guns taken. The enemy on the flank also commenced a retreat, and the British commander was permitted to occupy a position two miles from the citadel, without any further opposition. On the following morning, the whole force of the Spaniards, consisting of about 0000 men, came out of the town to meet the English, and commenced an attack in two columns, one of which was defeated and driven back with the loss of about 1,200 men; and the other retreated without coming to action. The siege of Monte Video almost immediately commenced; batteries were in a few days opened upon the town, and all the frigates and smaller vessels approached as closely as possible to assist in the cannonade. A battery was erected as near as possible to the wall, by the south gate of the citadel, which communicated with the sea, from which a vigorous fire was kept up, and on the 2d of February a breach was reported practicable. Orders were now given for the assault to commence an hour before day-break on the following morning. The troops destined for this service were commanded by Colonel Browne; and the remainder of the British force, including a corps of 700 marines and seamen, were encamped under Brigadier-General Lumley, to act as a corps of reserve, and to protect the rear. The morning was extremely dark, and the troops had approached near to the breach before they were discovered. But no sooner had the garrison become aware of their danger, than a destructive fire, from every gun that could be made to bear upon the breach, was opened, and showers of musquetry were poured down upon the assailants. The head of the British column, owing to the continued darkness, had the misfortune to miss the breach, which, in the course of the night, had been closed up and strongly barricaded with hides, notwithstanding all the fire of the besiegers. In this situation the troops remained, under a heavy fire, for a quarter of an hour, when the breach was discovered by Captain Renny, who pointed it out, and gloriously fell as he mounted it. The soldiers, difficult as was the access, forced their way to the ramparts, and from thence into the town, overturning the cannon which had been placed at the head of the principal avenues, and clearing the batteries and the streets with their bayonets. By eight o'clock in the morning, every thing was completely in their possession; perfect tranquillity reigned throughout the place, and the women were seen walking about the town without the slightest alarm.

From the first landing to the complete occupation of the citadel, the British loss amounted to about 600 men; Major Dalrymple was killed, and Lieutenant-Colonels

Vassal and Brownrigg died of their wounds. The loss sustained by the enemy was about 800 killed, and 500 wounded; about 2000 Spaniards were made prisoners, including the governor, Don Pasquil Ruis Huidobro; and 1,500 were supposed to have escaped in their boats, or to have secreted themselves in the town. In the month of June, a British expedition, under General Crawford, consisting of about 5000 troops, arrived in the river Plata, and was joined by the troops which had at different times arrived in South America since the first attack upon the Spanish settlements, by General Beresford. The command of this united force was given to General Whitelocke, and an attack upon Buenos Ayres was immediately resolved upon. After several delays, a landing was effected on the 28th of June without opposition at Ensenada, about thirty miles eastward of the town. Colonel Mahon, to whom the bringing up of the heavy artillery was intrusted, was directed to wait at Reduction till further orders; and the army, divided into two columns, after surmounting various difficulties, arrived before Buenos Ayres on the following day, when the fortress was summoned to surrender. This demand, as might have been anticipated, was peremptorily declined, and preparations were made for the attack. The British line was formed by placing General Auchmuty's brigade on the left, extending within two miles of Recoleta; the 36th and 88th regiments were on the right; and the brigade of General Crawford occupied the principal avenues to the town, about three miles distant from the great square and fort, his right being well supported by an appointment of dragoons, and the 45th regiment extending to the Residencia. The town was thus nearly invested. Understanding that the inhabitants meant to occupy the flat roofs of their houses for defence and annoyance, and that the town was divided into squares of about 140 yards each, General Whitelocke resolved to adopt the following plan of attack:—Every division, being provided with cannon, was to proceed along the street directly in its front, till it arrived at the last square adjoining the river, there to occupy the flat roofs of the houses, and to await further instruction; a corporal's guard was to march at the head of each column with instruments to break open the doors of the houses; and the musquets were to be kept unloaded till the columns were formed at their appointed final stations. These arrangements having been given out, the strong post of the Retiro and Plaza de Toros, was approached early in the morning of the 5th of July by General Auchmuty; and notwithstanding the severe discharges of grape shot and musquetry from the Spaniards, the General gained possession of the place, taking 32 pieces of cannon, 600 prisoners, and a vast quantity of ammunition. The 5th regiment advanced to the river, after experiencing very little opposition, and took possession of the church and convent of St. Catalina. The 36th and 88th regiments, under Brigadier-General Lumley, moving in the appointed order, were opposed in their march by an incessant fire of musquetry from the tops of the houses, the doors of which were so firmly barricaded, that scarcely any effort could force them open, while the streets were intersected by deep ditches, in the inside of which were planted cannon, which poured grape shot on the advancing columns. The 36th regiment, however, was enabled to overcome all this opposition, and to reach its final destination. The 88th regiment, which was more exposed to the fire of the forts, and to the principal defences of the Spaniards, was completely over-powered and taken. This misfortune rendered unavailing the success of the other regiment, and both the 36th and the 5th regiments were at length obliged to retreat upon the post of General Auchmuty. In the mean time, the British six-pounders, which had been appointed to move down the principal streets, covered by four troops of carabineers, led on by Lieutenant-Colonel Kingston, advanced to take the battery; but this gallant officer being unfortunately wounded, as well as Captain Burrell, next in command, and the fire, both from the battery and the houses, proving very destructive, they were obliged to fall back on a position in front of the enemy's principal defences. Lieutenant-Colonel Pack, with the left division of General Crawford's brigade, had advanced nearly to the river, where he was to occupy the Jesuits' College, which commanded the principal Spanish line of defence; but on turning to the left, the fire of the enemy became so overwhelming as to render all further advance absolutely impracticable. Part of this division took possession of a house, which was almost immediately found untenable, and no alternative remained but surrender or absolute destruction. The remainder of the division, after sustaining with intrepidity the incessant discharges of the enemy, by which their commander was wounded, retired upon the right division, commanded by General Crawford in person. The General, learning the fate of his left division, and being now opposed by immense superiority of numbers, thought it advisable to take possession of the convent of St. Domingo. The Residencia had been gained by Colonel Guard, with very slight opposition, and leaving this position in possession of his light companies, the Colonel advanced with his principal force towards General Crawford, and joined him at the convent. The building was almost instantly surrounded by the enemy. In this emergency, General Crawford was obliged to confine himself to the defence of the convent; but the quantity of round shot, grape, and musquetry, to which the troops were exposed, at length obliged them to quit the top of the building; and the Spaniards, to the number, of 6000 bringing up cannon to force the wooden gates, the General, with all the troops under his command, surrendered at four o'clock in the afternoon. "The result of this day's action," says General Whitelocke, "left me in possession of the Plaza de Toros, a strong post on the enemy's right, and the Residencia, another strong post on his left, while I occupied the advanced position towards his centre; but these advantages had cost 2,500 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners. The nature of the fire to which the troops were exposed was violent in the extreme. Grape shot at the corners of the streets; musquetry, hand-grenades, bricks, and stones, from the tops of all the houses; every householder, with his negroes, defending his dwelling, each of which was in itself a fortress; and it is not, perhaps, too much to say, that the whole male population of Buenos Ayres was employed in its defence." The night of the 5th exhibited an impressive pause in the work of destruction. On the following morning General Liniers addressed a letter to the British commander, offering to deliver up the prisoners taken on this occasion, and also those taken from General Beresford, on condition that the attack on the town should be discontinued, and that, within two months from that date, Monte Video, and the other stations on the river Plata, occupied by the English troops, should be evacuated. It was stated, in this dispatch, that the exasperation of the populace against the English prisoners was unbounded, and that, if hostilities were persisted in by General Whitelocke, it would be impossible to insure their safety. These terms were no sooner proposed than they were yielded to by the British General, who was determined to this assent principally from a reference to the situation of the prisoners, which, from unquestionable intelligence, he understood to be highly critical; and from the consideration that the possession of a country, whose inhabitants were so decidedly hostile to the conquerors, could be attended with no permanent advantage. The conduct of General Whitelocke, in conducting this expedition, called forth the most severe reprehension; and the entire failure of the enterprise produced universal dissatisfaction and disappointment. The General, on his return to England, after the entire evacuation of South America, was put upon his trial before a court-martial, assembled at Chelsea, on the 28th of January, 1808, and cotinued by adjournment for two-and-thirty days. By this tribunal he was pronounced guilty of all the charges preferred against him, except that part of the second which related to the order, that the musquets of the columns should be unloaded, and that no firing should be permitted on any account; and being declared totally unfit and unworthy to serve his Majesty in any military capacity whatever, was cashiered.*

The victories of Buonaparte, and the consequent peace of Tilsit, had laid nearly the whole of Europe at the feet of the Conqueror. Denmark, however had hitherto remained unmolested; but, from the general policy of Buonaparte, every thing was to be apprehended; and the Crown Prince of Denmark, draining the rest of his dominions of their forces, had for three years kept the flower of the Danish youth assembled on the borders of Holstein, to protect the only quarter in which aggression seemed to be possible, from the entrance of that army which had long hovered on its frontier. The British government therefore determined to dispatch to the Baltic a powerful armament, consisting of 20,000 troops, under the command of Lieutenant-General Lord Cathcart; and a fleet of twenty sail of the line, with vessels of all other descriptions, under Admiral Gambier. When the intelligence of this expedition first reached Copenhagen, it was universally supposed, in that city, that the English army was intended to co-operate with the Swedes in the defence of Stralsund, and in the re-conquering the rest of Pomerania; and the only apprehension was that it would arrive too late. The illusion was, however, speedily dissipated, by the arrival of Mr. Jackson in the Danish capital, on the 1st of August, as plenipotentiary on behalf of his Britannic Majesty. The English negociator, having failed in the object of his mission, on the 16th of August, Lord Cathcart disembarked his forces at Wybeck, and nearly at the same time the British troops from Stralsund effected a landing in Keoge Bay, swelling the land force to 28,000 men. On the day after the landing of the troops, they advanced in three columns, with very trifling opposition, to invest Copenhagen, which was effected on the north and south by the military force, and by the naval power on the east. The regular works were now commenced and carried on with great spirit; and while they were rapidly advancing, the frigates and gun boats took advantage of a favourable breeze to station themselves near the entrance of the harbour, from which they might throw shells into the town. Brigadier-General Deckon, who had been sent against Fredericksworth, succeeded in surprising that important post, by which a depot of cannon and powder, and upwards of 800 Danish soldiers, fell into the hands of the besiegers. The country now roused into an extreme state of irritation against the invaders, General Castenschield was enabled to accumulate a formidable voluntary force, and in addition to these irregular troops, three or four battalions of disciplined soldiers contributed to swell the General's ranks. On the 26th this army was attacked by Sir Arthur Wellesley, and defeated with a loss of 60 officers, 1,100 men, and 10 pieces of cannon. Having dispersed these troops, the British General moved towards the centre of the island, with a view to disarm and keep down the rising spirit of the country, in which endeavour he so effectually succeeded as to prevent the besieging army from experiencing any further molestation from this quarter. In the interim, the contest was carried on with great vigour between the Danish gun-boats and praams, supported by the crown battery, a block-house, and some other works, and the advanced squadron of the British gun-boats, when the latter were at length obliged to retire before the destructive fire of the red-hot shot of the enemy. Between the British batteries on shore, and the enemy's gun-boats, the conflict on the part of the former was more successful, and the Danes were, in their turn, obliged to retreat with considerable loss. The besieging army had now advanced its positions to the inundation in front of the city; and the moment rapidly approached in which the more serious operations of the siege were to commence. As no overtures for accommodation had been made or yielded to by the Danes, and as every thing evinced their determination to endure the horrors of a bombardment, the heavy ordnance were landed on the 26th, and by the 31st the platform was laid, and the mortar batteries were ready for action. A summons was now dispatched by the British Commanders to General Pieman, the Governor of Copenhagen, containing the same offers which had been originally made by Mr. Jackson, that, "if he would consent to deliver up the Danish fleet, and to our carrying it away, it should be held as a deposit for his Danish Majesty, and should be restored with all its equipments, in as good a state as received, as soon as the provisions of a general peace should remove the necessity which had occasioned this demand. The property of all sorts, which had been captured since the commencement of hostilities, would be restored to its owners, and the union between the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, and Denmark, might be renewed. But if this offer were rejected now, it could not be repeated. The captured property, public and private, must then belong to the captors, and the city when taken must share the fate of conquered places." The offer was again peremptorily refused; in consequence of which, the mortar batteries, observes Lord Gambier, in his official dispatches, "which had been erected by the army in several positions they had taken round Copenhagen, together with the bomb vessels, which were placed in convenient situations, began the bombardment on the morning of the 2d of September, with such power and effect, that in a short time the town was set on fire, and, by the repeated discharges of our artillery, was kept in flames in different places till the evening of the 5th, when, a considerable part of it being consumed, and the conflagration, arrived at a great height, threatened the speedy destruction of the whole city, the General commanding the garrison sent out a flag of truce, desiring an armistice to afford time to treat for a capitulation." It was explained to General Pieman, in reply, that the basis of the capitulation must be the delivering up of the fleet; which in a subsequent letter from the General was admitted; and on the morning of the 7th, the articles of capitulation, which had been settled during the night of the 6th, were ratified. By these articles, the British forces were to be put in immediate possession of the citadel and dock yards; all the ships of war and naval stores of his Danish Majesty were to be delivered up; the prisoners were to be mutually restored; private property was to be respected; the functions of the civil and military officers were to receive no interruption; and within six weeks the citadel was to be restored to his Danish Majesty, in the state in which it was occupied, and the British troops were to have evacuated the island of Zealand. The navy, delivered up in consequence of this agreement, consisted of sixteen ships of the line, fifteen frigates, six brigs, and twenty-five gun boats, besides vessels on the stocks; in the arsenals were found stores sufficient to fit for sea all this formidable fleet; and all the ships of the line and frigates were laden with the masts, spars, and timber that remained. A considerable part of the stores of this description were put on board the Leyden and Inflexible; and some of the more valuable articles on board others of his Majesty's ships; notwithstanding which there still remained sufficient to load ninety-two transports, and other vessels, chartered for this purpose, and whose cargoes, at least, amounted

* An enterprise of considerable consequence, and terminating more happily than the expedition against Buenos Ayres, was accomplished the first day in the year 1807, by a squadron of four frigates, (the Arethusa, Latona, Anson, and Fisgard) commanded by Captain Brisbane, under the orders of Vice-Admiral Dacres. The expedition was directed against the Dutch settlement of Curacoa. The harbour was defended by regular fortifications of two tiers of guns; Fort Amsterdam alone contained sixty-six pieces of cannon. The entrance was only fifty yards wide, and across it were moored two frigates and two large schooners of war. A chain of forts was on the commanding height of Misselburg; and Fort Republique, deemed nearly impregnable, was within the distance of grape-shot, and enfiladed the whole harbour. Soon after day-break, the British frigates made all possible sail in close order of battle. The vessels appointed to intercept their entrance were taken by boarding; and the lower forts, the citadel, and the town of Amsterdam, by storm. The port was entered at about six o'clock in the morning; before ten a capitulation was signed; the British flag was hoisted on Fort Republique, and the whole island was in complete possession of the assailants. The loss of the British amounted only to three men killed, and eleven wounded; and the inhabitants of the town, to the amount of thirty thousand, swore allegiance to the British government.

to 20,000 tons. The loss sustained by the British, before Copenhagen, did not exceed 200 men; that of the Danes was much more considerable: it amounted to about 2,000 persons; 400 houses were destroyed, and the venerable edifice of Frederic Kirk was laid in ruins.*

The conduct of the Emperor of Russia, in acceding to the treaty of Tilsit, had tended considerably to relax the bond of union between the courts of London and St. Peterburgh; and the ascendency which Buonaparte appeared to have acquired over Alexander, rendered it far from improbable that Russia might soon join in hostility against England, with which she had so long, but so unsuccessfully co-operated. Apprehension was at length converted into certainty. The season of the year having arrived in which annoyance from Britain could not be apprehended, the British ambassador was ordered to leave St. Petersburgh, and on the 31st of October, a declaration of war was issued against England.†

Buonaparte's efforts to exclude English commerce, and to establish his "continental system," were this year continued with rigorous perseverance and undiminished pressure. To embarrass the trade and finances of Great Britain, Europe was obliged, in a great degree, to abandon those luxuries which long habit had almost rendered necessary supplies. The restrictions enforced against England were followed on her part by a system of retaliation, which deprived multitudes in France of the means of honest industry, and even of relief under disease and pain. The regular channels of communication, through which British manufactures and colonial produce had poured in immense supplies, extending in opposite directions to the remotest points of the Continent, were now dried up. The distress of the West India planters, in consequence of the exclusion of their produce from the usual markets, excited particular attention; and to remedy this evil, a committee of the House of Commons, appointed to inquire into the most effectual means of affording them relief, recommended a decrease of duty upon colonial produce, an advance of bounty upon its importation, and the interruption of its intercourse carried on by American ships between the colonies of Cuba, Porto Rico, Martinique, and Guadaloupe, through the medium of the United States, to Europe.‡ On the 7th of January, 1807, an order of council was issued, which prevented neutral vessels from trading from any port in the possession, or under the control of the enemy. On the 11th of November, additional orders in council were issued, by which every port of every country from which Great Britain was excluded, was declared to be in a state of blockade. All trade in the produce and manufactures of these countries was pronounced illegal, and the vessels employed in such trade were liable to seizure. Thus was the trade along the coasts of France and of her allies, in neutral vessels, completely prohibited; and though the Americans might still freely trade with the enemy's colonies, for articles of their own consumption, the double restriction was imposed upon the intercourse by them between France and her colonies, of calling at a British port and paying a British duty. To avoid the losses and hostilities which were to be apprehended from the measures respectively adopted by England and France, the American Congress on the 22d of December, resolved to lay a strict embargo on all the vessels of the United States. By this act, their own vessels were prohibited from departing from any of their ports; and ships from all other nations were commanded to quit the American harbours, with or without cargoes, as soon as the act was notified to them. The first impression made by the intelligence of the embargo in this country, was a general feeling of alarm among commercial men; and the merchants of Liverpool, considering that this act of congress proceeded from our orders in council, petitioned for their speedy removal; but Parliament did not think proper to comply with their requests. Buonaparte, aware that all restrictions upon commerce would, from the situation and pursuits of England, fall upon this country with a much heavier pressure than upon

* In justification of this measure, it was said, that "his Majesty had received the most positive information of the determination of the present ruler of France to occupy with a military force the territory of Holstein, for the purpose of excluding Great Britain from her accustomed channels of communication with the continent; or inducing or compelling the court of Denmark to close the passage of the Sound against British commerce and navigation; and of availing himself of the aid of the Danish marine for the invasion of Great Britain and Ireland; and further, "Holstein once occupied; Zealand would be at the mercy of France, and the navy of Denmark at her disposal." The measure adopted was therefore regarded as an act of self-preservation.

† In this paper, the Emperor regrets the existing alienation of his Britannic Majesty in proportion to the great value which he had placed upon his friendship. Twice had the Emperor taken up arms in a cause in which England was peculiarly concerned, but in the accomplishment of her own projects he had in vain solicited her co-operation. When peace was re-established with France by Russia, the latter had offered her mediation to England. This had been rejected, unquestionably on a determination to break off all the existing ties between the two nations. At the moment when it was thus in the power of England to complete that general peace which was so much desired, her fleets and troops were summoned to execute an act of outrage unequalled in history, and to attack a power which, by its moderate conduct and wise neutrality, maintained a sort of moral dignity amidst surrounding and conflicting monarchies. The Prince royal of Denmark had communicated all the insiduous propositions of England to the Emperor, and reposed in him a just confidence. The Emperor, touched with the confidence reposed in him, and having considered his own peculiar complaints against England, and his engagements with the powers of the north, had resolved to recall his embassy from England; to terminate all communication with her; to act on the principles of the armed neutrality, and never to recede from them; to procure the restoration of all unjustly detained vessels and merchandise; not to re-establish any communication before complete satisfaction was given to Denmark; and to require of his Britannic Majesty, instead of "suffering his ministers to scatter the seeds of fresh war, to conclude such a treaty with the Emperor of France, as should prolong interminably the invaluable blessings of peace." To this declaration, a vindicatory answer was returned by the British government on the 18th of December.

‡ In the practice of searching American vessels for British seamen, incidents were perpetually occurring to keep alive the spirit of exasperation between the two countries. In the former year, John Pierce, an American seamen, was killed by a shot fired from on board the Leander; and in the course of the present year another fatal occurrence took place, which threatened consequences of the most serious nature. A British squadron, under Admiral Berkeley, had been for some time stationed at the entrance to the river Chesapeake; and while the American frigate, the Chesapeake, of 44 guns, was equipping for the Mediterranean, under Commodore Barron, several seamen had deserted from the English ships, and engaged themselves to serve on board the American frigate. Representations of these circumstances having been made to the agents of the American government without effect, an order was in consequence issued by Admiral Berkeley to the Captain of the Leopard frigate, to cruise off the Cape, for the purpose of intercepting the Chesapeake, after she had passed the limits of the American waters, and examining her for deserters. In compliance with these directions, Captain Humphries sent a boat on board the American frigate on the 23d of June, as she was advancing on her voyage, apprising the Commodore that he had deserters on board, and that he had received orders to search for them. The demand of Captain Humphries not being acceded to, he fired several shots, without injuring the American vessel; no attention being paid to these demonstrations, a broadside was poured into the Chesapeake, which she returned with six or seven detached shots, and, on receiving a second broadside, struck her colours. On examination, several deserters were found; and the object of the conflict being accomplished, the Chesapeake, which had suffered a loss of six men killed, and twenty-one wounded, was dismissed in a shattered condition to her port. No sooner had intelligence of this event reached the American government, than a proclamation was issued by the president, in which, after stating the constant recurrence of British officers on the coast, to a state of insubordination to the laws, violence towards the persons, and trespasses on the property of the citizens of the United States, while they were enjoying all the means of refitment; the affair of the Chesapeake was noticed as a deed transcending all which the Americans had seen or suffered, and which brought their sensibilities to a crisis, and their forbearance to a pause. Hospitality, in such circumstances, ceased to be a duty; and all armed vessels of Great Britain were ordered immediately to quit the American harbours, and were interdicted entrance into any of the ports of the United States. On the arrival of the intelligence of the unfortunate affair of the Chesapeake in England, considerable surprise and regret were universally expressed; and ministers hesitated not to declare in Parliament, their readiness to make every reparation, for whatever might appear, on full and accurate information, an unauthorised act of hostility. In pursuance of this disposition, Admiral Berkeley was recalled from the American station; and in a proclamation issued for recalling British seamen, it was stated, that force might, if necessary, be exercised for recovering of deserters on board the merchant vessels of neutrals, but that, with respect to ships of war, a requision only should be made to deliver up deserters; and on their refusal, information was to be given to the British ministers at the neutral courts, or to the British government at home. By this proclamation, the conduct of Admiral Berkeley was tacitly disavowed, and Mr. Rose, the son of the Treasurer of the Navy, was soon after dispatched on a special mission to America, with overtures of conciliation; which, however, proved abortive.

France,

France, felt no disposition to relax in this new species of warfare; and accordingly, on the 23d of November, a decree was issued from Milan, enacting "that all vessels which, after having touched at England, from any nation whatever, shall enter the ports of France, shall be seized and confiscated, as well as their cargoes, without exception or distinction of commodities or merchandise." This interdict was, on the 19th of the following month, followed by a rejoinder to the orders in council of the 11th of November, by which it was declared, that every neutral which submitted to be searched by an English ship, or paid any duty whatsoever to the English government, should be considered as thereby denationalized, and having forfeited the protection of its own government, should in consequence be liable to seizure as a lawful prize by French ships of war. Neutral powers were thus placed between confiscation and confiscation. If they proceeded to a French port, without first paying a duty upon their cargoes in England, they were liable to be captured by British cruisers; and if they came to England and paid the duty, they then became subject to confiscation in the ports of the enemy. The case was one of extreme hardship; and in this country, where war had not obliterated all sense of moral obligation, and where a spirit of hostility had entirely silenced the voice of discretion, the justice and the policy of the orders in council underwent a severe scrutiny, and called forth the most animated discussions.

Buonaparte, having overcome all opposition in the north of Europe found himself at leisure to pursue his schemes of aggrandisement in the south. His armies entered Spain; and, having marked Portugal for his prey, he publicly declared that the house of Braganza should cease to reign." A French force, under General Junot, entered Portugal, and, on the evening of the 26th of November, had reached Abrantes within three days march of Lisbon. At this alarming crisis, the Prince Regent of Portugal having hastily concerted his measures with Lord Strangford, the English minister at Lisbon, adopted the prudent and vigorous resolution of transferring the royal family and the seat of the Portuguese government to Brazil. No time having been left for delay, the embarkation was expeditiously performed; and, on the morning of the 29th, the Portuguese fleet (consisting of 8 ships of the line, 4 frigates, 3 brigs and a schooner) sailed out of the Tagus, having on board the Prince of Brazil, with the whole of the royal family, and a number of persons attached to its fortunes. The French troops having arrived in the vicinity of Lisbon, had, from the heights, a view of the fleet as it dropped down the river. They then entered the city without opposition.

The migration of the Braganza family, which has no example in modern, and scarcely any in ancient history, was performed under the protection of the British navy. Sir Sydney Smith, with a British squadron, accompanied the royal emigrants to Rio de Janeiro, where, after a prosperous voyage, they arrived on the 9th of January following. A direct intercourse having been thus established between England and Brazil, a new epoch was formed in the history of commerce.

A. D. 1808.] A scene equally interesting and equally extraordinary, now burst forth in Spain. After Buonaparte had, in the pretended character of a friend and ally, introduced his armies into Spain, the reigning monarch, Charles IV. perplexed and harassed by court intrigues, and popular turbulence, was induced or compelled, to resign his crown to his son, the Prince of Asturias. The new sovereign, Ferdinand VII. with his father, the abdicated monarch, the whole of the royal family, and some of the principal grandees, were, in a mysterious manner, allured to take a journey to Bayonne, for the purpose of an interview with Napoleon. Having thus secured the two Kings, Buonaparte obliged them to sign a formal abdication, and the infants Don Carlos and Don Antonio, renounced all claim of succession to the Spanish crown. By the French, these abdications and renunciations were represented as voluntary acts; but, by Spain, and the rest of Europe, they were contemplated in a very different light. An Imperial decree, however, was issued, declaring the throne of Spain to be vacant, by the abdication of the reigning family; a Junta, composed of the partisans of France, was convened at Bayonne; and Buonaparte conferred the crown of Spain on his brother Joseph, who abdicated his kingdom of Naples in favour of the Grand Duke of Berg, Murat.

The circumstances of the time induced a belief, that the new government would meet with little opposition. The French occupied all the strongest and most commanding positions, the main body of their army was stationed in Madrid, and all the principal cities and fortresses were garrisoned by their detachments. At that time, the French could not have fewer than 100,000 troops in Spain, and 20,000 in Portugal. Notwithstanding the presence of so formidable a force, the news of the compulsatory renunciations of the Bourbon dynasty formed the signal for a general insurrection. Indeed, at Madrid, the inhabitants had been in a state of agitation and alarm ever since the entrance of the French troops and the departure of the royal family. The French were daily insulted; numerous assemblies were held by the people; and every thing indicated the approach of an explosion. On the morning of the 2d of May, immense crowds collected in the principal streets of the capital. Rendered confident by their numbers, they attacked the French troops with great vigour and resolution, and after forcing them to retreat, obtained possession of their cannon. With these they succeeded in forcing their enemies out of the city, with great slaughter. Besides this regular and concentrated attack on the great body of the military, wherever a French soldier was discovered, he was instantly cut down or shot. The great street of Alcala, the Sun-Gate, and the Great Square, were the principal scenes of the early success and of the subsequent massacre of the inhabitants. The alarm was no sooner given, than the French repaired to their posts, and the large reinforcements which poured into the city overwhelmed the insurgents. The principal object with the French army was the street Alcala, in which were collected upwards of ten thousand people. Against this and the neighbouring streets and squares, thirty discharges of artillery were directed with murderous effect; these were followed up by the cavalry; the people, routed and dismayed, took refuge in the houses; and the French soldiers, irritated to the highest degree by their previous defeat, followed them into their retreats, and took signal vengeance on the insurgents. The place where the Spaniards made the most vigorous defence was the Store-house of artillery, which, besides ammunition, contained upward of ten thousand stand of arms. Thither Murat sent a detachment to take possession of the Arsenal, but he found it occupied by a number of the inhabitants and Spanish artillery-men, under the command of two brave officers of the names of Doaiz and Velayde, A twenty-four pounder, charged with grape-shot, placed at the gate of the Store-house, in front of a long and narrow street, made dreadful havoc among the French column as it advanced, and obliged the commander to send to Murat for reinforcements. Two other French columns then advanced, and after attacking the small garrison on both flanks, repeatedly summoned it to surrender, but the brave and resolute commanders refused to listen to the proposition, and their constancy remained unshaken to the last moment of their existence. After the engagement had raged for some time, Velayde was killed by a musket shot, and Doaiz had his thigh broken by a cannon ball: this hero still continued to give his orders with the greatest composure, till he had received three other wounds, the last of which put an end to his glorious career. The command of the Arsenal now devolved on a corporal of artillery, who, sensible that all further resistance would be unavailing, agreed to capitulate. About two o'clock the firing ceased in all parts of the city, in consequence of the personal interference of the council of Castile, who paraded the streets with many of the Spanish nobility, escorted by a body of Spanish soldiers and French imperial guards intermixed. The inhabitants of of Madrid now flattered themselves that the carnage was at an end, but in the afternoon, Murat issued general orders to his army for the immediate formation of a military tribunal, of which General Grouchy was appointed president. Before this tribunal all persons were brought who had been made prisoners in the early part of the day, and, after a summary trial, three groups of forty each were successively shot, in the Prado, by the hands of the military executioners. In this manner was the evening of the 2d of May spent by the French at Madrid. The inhabitants were commanded to illuminate their houses for the safety of their oppressors; and through the whole night, the dead and dying were to be seen lying in heaps upon the blood-stained pavement. When the morning arrived, the military tribunals resumed their functions, and for several successive days the feelings of the inhabitants of the capital were outraged by judicial murders. The numbers slain on the 2d of May on the side of the people must have been immense; and it is stated, on the authority of an eye-witness, that the insurrection was not quelled till after most of the French soldiers actually in the city at the time of its commencement, were put to death.

This effort of the citizens of Madrid, which ought to have aroused the Junta to a sense of their duty, produced directly the opposite effect, and bent them completely to the will of Murat. Through his influence, the Holy Inquisition addressed a circular to all the courts of the kingdom, in which they accused the Spanish people of having occasioned, by their factious disposition, and outrageous violence, the disturbances and bloodshed of the 2d of May.

The patriotic flame burnt brightly in the province of Asturias, whose brave inhabitants, at the time of the Arabian invasion, had preserved the remains of the Spanish monarchy, and whose intrepid spirit, through a succession of eleven centuries, had been transmitted to their descendants. From Asturias, the insurrection spread into Gallicia, and several districts of Leon. A Provincial Junta assembled at Oviedo, published a formal declaration of war against France; and, having appointed the Marquis of Santa Cruz, General of the patriotic army, sent a deputation to solicit the assistance of England. This request was readily granted, and the British government declared itself at peace with the Spanish nation.* The defence of Arragon was committed to General Palafox, whose bold and animating addresses had contributed to rouse his countrymen to arms. Sarragossa, the principal city of Arragon, was considered, by the French, as a place of so much importance, that they made repeated attacks upon that fortress, with all the forces they could spare. But the army of Palafox, animated to the highest degree, by the wrongs of their country, and the zeal of their leader, was fully adequate to defend the city, and to repel all the attacks with which it was assailed. The city was frequently bombarded in the midst of the night, at the same time that the gates were attempted to be forced under cover of the shells. The French, more than once, obtained possession of some parts of the town; but they were received with so much coolness and bravery, that they were never able to preserve what they had, with so much difficulty and loss, acquired. The women vied with their husbands, sons, and brothers, in the display of patriotism and contempt of danger; regardless of the fire of the enemy, they rushed into the midst of the battle, administering support and refreshment to the exhausted and wounded, and animated, by their exhortations and example, all ranks to such a display of firmness and bravery, as ultimately to secure this important city. Another object of great importance to both the contending parties, was to obtain possession of the principal road between Bayonne and Madrid. Cuesta was the Spanish General appointed by the Junta to command the army destined to secure that important object. This army consisted partly of peasants, and partly of regular troops, which had been collected from different parts in the north of Spain. Lasoles was the French General dispatched by Marshal Bessieres for the same purpose. The hostile armies met on the 14th of July, at Rio Seco, near Valladolid. The new levies, led on by their ardour and impetuosity, were not to be restrained by the command of their General; they rushed forward as soon as they came near the French, and at the first onset drove them back, and took and spiked four pieces of cannon. Unfortunately, however, the nature of the country, which was level and open, and the consequent advantage which the French gained in their superiority in cavalry, prevented the Spanish army from securing and maintaining their advantage, and obliged them to retreat to Benevento under the cover and protection of a regiment of carabineers, leaving, behind them, thirteen pieces of cannon. On this occasion, the French suffered so severely that they were not able to pursue the Spanish army, nor even to take possession of Rio Seco till several hours after the battle. The French afterwards took possession of St. Andero.

Their triumph, however, was of short duration: in consequence of the advance of General de Ponti, with a division of 10,000 men from the Asturian army, the French detachment afraid of having their retreat cut off, evacuated the town precipitately, having previously committed every kind of depredation and outrage.—Murat, aware of all that had taken place in the different parts of the kingdom, thought it prudent to withdraw his forces from the capital, and to station them on the Retiro, an eminence at a little distance,

* The great commercial city of Cadiz was one of the first to shew its zeal for the patriotic cause. A French squadron of five ships of the line, and two frigates, lying in the harbour, was obliged, on the 14th of June, to surrender to the Spanish arms, under General Moria, after having sustained a cannonade and bombardment from the batteries for three days, while the British fleet, under Admiral Purvis, stationed off that port, prevented its escape. The importance of preserving the French fleet at Cadiz, and the probability that it would fall into the hands of the Spaniards, had induced Murat to dispatch General Dupont from Madrid, with a considerable force, to the south of Spain. Scarcely, however, had this General passed the Sierra Morena, before he heard of the surrender of the French fleet, and the disposition of the people soon convinced him that it would be unsafe to advance farther towards Cadiz. After pushing on to Cordova, of which he obtained a temporary possession, he measured back his steps to Andujar. The Spanish General, Castanos, who, at the commencement of the insurrection, was stationed in the camp of St. Roche, marched at the head of the Andalusian army, against General Dupont. After several partial actions, in which the Spaniards uniformly succeeded, either in repelling the attacks of the French, or in forcing them to fall back, and by which Castanos had brought his raw troops into habits of activity, firmness and discipline, it was determined in a council of war, held on the 17th of July, that an attack should be made on the town of Baylen, where the van of the French army was posted. At three o'clock in the morning of the 19th, while the troops of the Spanish General, Reding, were forming for the march, General Dupont, with his army, attached the Spanish camp in the vicinity of Baylen, opening a sudden and tremendous fire with his artillery; and so determined was the resolution of the French General to make a decisive impression on the Spanish line, that his attacks were renewed till twelve o'clock; with no other interruption or intermission but such as necessarily arose from the occasional recession and formation of new columns. At this period, he seemed disposed to give up the attack; but, before this resolution was taken, one other effort, led by General Dupont himself, and supported by his other Generals, was made upon the Spanish lines, but with no better success. During these repeated, impetuous, and almost uninterrupted attacks, the Spanish line had been frequently penetrated in different parts; and the French had more than once succeeded in arriving at their batteries. But the Spanish army, with more coolness, intrepidity, and discipline, than might have been expected from raw and inexperienced levies, formed again with astonishing regularity, dismounted the enemy's artillery, and cut to pieces the attacking columns, at the same time that they varied their own positions and movements, in such a manner as to be constantly in a state of preparation, and to repel the rapid advances of the enemy. This success of General Reding over the main body of the French army, led on by General Dupont, in person, decided the fate of the day, and rendered unavailing the reinforcement of 6000 men dispatched from Madrid, under the command of the French General Wedel. Under these circumstances, Dupont proposed to capitulate, and on the 20th, the whole of the French army, comprising the division of Wedel, delivered up their arms, on condition that they should be embarked at Cadiz, and sent to Rochefort. It appeared from the official returns, that the French forces, before the battle of Baylen, and exclusive of the division under General Wedel, consisted of 14,000 men; of which number nearly 3000 were killed and wounded. The Spanish army consisted of 25,000 men, one half of whom were peasantry, and their loss was stated at 1200 in killed and wounded. By this capitulation, the army of General Castanos had not only freed the province of Andalusia, and the whole of the south-west of Spain, from the presence and devastation of the French, but they had opened themselves a ready path to the capital of the kingdom, and to a junction with their companions in arms.

sufficiently elevated to protect him from a sudden attack, and to give him, in some measure, the command of the city. Whilst the Spanish troops were every where successful, and preparing themselves for new victories, Buonparte remained at Bayonne, directing or receiving the deliberations of the Junta which he had convened, and drawing up a constitution for Spain. As soon as the new constitution had been submitted to the Junta, Joseph Buonaparte, accompanied by his principal ministers, set out for the capital of his unconquered kingdom; Murat, under plea of bad health, having previously quitted that city, and arrived at Bayonne. Under the protection of 10,000 men, Joseph arrived in safety, on the evening of the 20th of July, at Madrid, where he was crowned, amidst the gloom and hatred of the inhabitants. On the very day that he entered the capital, Dupont, as already stated, surrendered himself and his army, prisoners to Castanos. As soon as this news reached Madrid, Joseph and his court found themselves compelled to seek their safety in flight; consoling themselves, however, by carrying off the regalia and plate belonging to the crown. Immediately afterwards, the council of Castile resumed the government, at Madrid, with professions of ardent attachment to the cause of their deposed monarch; but these professions were received with distrust by the patriots; and the government of the country still continued to be administered by the Junta of Seville. It was also judged expedient to form a military Junta at Madrid, composed of five Generals, including Castanos and Morla.

In England, an expedition which had been fitted out under Sir Arthur Wellesley, for the purpose, it was supposed, of proceeding against Spanish America, was countermanded on the arrival of the news of the insurrection in Spain. This army, consisting originally of about 9000 men, set sail from Cork, on the 12th of July, and arrived at Corunna on the 20th of the same month. The battle of Medina del Rio Seco, had taken place a few days before, and the Spaniards were retreating in every direction. Sir Arthur Wellesley offered the assistance of the force under his command, to the Junta of Galicia; but that body, unintimidated by their late reverses, replied, that they wished for nothing from the British government except money, arms, and ammunition. They expressed their firm conviction, however, that the army under Sir Arthur Wellesley might be of infinite service both to the Portuguese and the Spanish nation, if it were employed in driving the French from Lisbon. The English government next turned its thoughts to the Spanish troops which Buonaparte had drawn, under the pretence of securing Hanover, to the northern parts of Germany. This force, to the amount of 8000 men, was stationed in the Danish island of Funen. A negociation being entered into between their commander, the Marquis de la Romana, and the British Admiral, Sir Richard Keates, to effect their liberation, the Spaniards seized the vessels and small craft on the coast, by which they were conveyed to Langeland, where they joined 2000 of their countrymen. Thus 10,000 Spanish troops were rescued from the power of Buonaparte, and after being supplied with every thing of which they stood in need, were landed on the northern coast of Spain, to support the patriotic cause.

Buonaparte having returned to Paris, on the 5th of September, a senatus consultum was adopted, unanimously, by the French senate, by which 160,000 men were to be raised for the augmentation of the army. This circumstance, combined with the report of the French minister for foreign affairs, in which it was stated, that an army of 200,000 men was to be placed at the service of the war in Spain, sufficiently indicated that the insurrections in that country, had not shaken his purposes. Having arranged his military operations, Bounaparte set out from Paris, to meet his confederates, the dependant German Princes, and the Emperor Alexander, at Erfurth. The proceedings of this meeting were never suffered to transpire, but it cannot be doubted that one of its objects was to over-awe Austria, and to arrange the co-operation of Russia, and the confederate states of the Rhine against her, if she attempted to avail herself of the war in Spain. On his return to Paris, he addressed the Legislative Body; making known to them, the perfect union of sentiment between himself and the Emperor of Russia, with respect both to peace and to war; and he assured them that they had determined to make sacrifices in order to procure for the 100,000,000 of men, whom they represented, an early enjoyment of the commerce of the seas. He announced his resolution to depart in a few days, to put himself at the head of his armies; and, by their means, to crown the King of Spain at Madrid, and to plant his eagles on the forts of Lisbon.

Subsequently to this period, the progress of the campaign was unfavourable to the Spaniards. Having fully succeeded against the patriotic armies in the north-west of Spain, Buonaparte suddenly and unexpectedly directed his efforts against the forces under Castanos, on the Ebro. The first advances of the enemy against Castanos took place on the 21st of November, with 12,000 infantry, and 4000 cavalry, on the lines of Coma. The Spanish General immediately fell back, and occupied a position from Tarragona to Tudela, the troops of the army of Arragon resting upon the latter place. On the 23d, three columns of the enemy were perceived marching in the direction of Tudela, and by eight o'clock in the morning, he had occupied all the points of attack. Part of the field of battle was commanded by heights, which Castanos had neglected to occupy. Of this oversight the French took advantage; and, at the same time, penetrating the centre of the Spaniards, completely decided the fortune of the day. One division of the Spanish army was successful, and compelled the enemy to retreat; but, following the pursuit too far, they were taken in the rear, by a part of the French army, which had penetrated through Tudela, to the right. The Spaniards, thus broken into separate divisions, could not support each other, and a retreat became unavoidable. Thus, in the short space of three weeks, were the grand armies of Blake, Castanos, and Count Belveder, on which the principal hopes of the Spanish nation rested for the defence of the capital, and the north of Spain, defeated; and, in a great measure, dispersed.

During these disasters of the Spanish army, the troops which had been sent by Britain to the aid of the patriots, were not far enough advanced either to support their allies, or to oppose any efficient check to the progress of the enemy. Sir John Moore, with about 15,000 men, arrived at Salamanca, on the 14th of November. Sir David Baird was at Astorga at the same time, with about 14,000 men: and a brigade of 10,000 men, under General Hope, were on their route towards Madrid. In consequence of the rapid advances and successes of the French, General Hope, after reaching the Escurial, found it expedient to retreat, and form a junction with Sir Jonn Moore: and, upon the latter receiving intelligence of the defeat of Castanos, all the British forces began their retreat, but the two divisions soon after resumed their respective positions at Astorga and Salamanca. On the 22d of November, eleven days after the battle of Tudela, Buonaparte removed his head-quarters from Burgos, and marched against Madrid, by the direct road of the Castiles.—The van-guard of his army arrived, at day-break on the 30th, at the foot of the Somo Sierra. The Puerto, a passage of this mountain, was defended by a division of from 12 to 15,000 Spaniards, and by a battery of 16 pieces of cannon. After an animated resistance, the Spaniards finding themselves too weak to withstand the powerful army to which they were opposed, sought safety in flight, leaving their cannon in the hands of the enemy. On the 2d of December, Buonaparte, preceding the main body of his army, arrived with his cavalry only, on the heights which overlook the capital of Spain. The inhabitants of Madrid had only thought of their defence eight days before the arrival of the French armies, and all their preparations were marked by precipitation and inexperience. One of Marshal Bessieres' aids-de-camp was sent in the morning to summon summon Madrid, but when it was known that he was the bearer of a proposal for the city to submit to the French, he narrowly escaped being torn to pieces by the enraged inhabitants, and owed his life to the protection of the Spanish troops of the line. At nine o'clock, in the morning of the 3d, the cannonade commonced. Thirty pieces of cannon, under the command of General Cenarmont, battered the walls of the Retiro, while 20 other pieces, and some light troops, made a false attack in another quarter, for the purpose of distracting the attention of the patriots, and of obliging them to divide their forces. In less than an hour, the 4000 Spanish regulars, who defended the gardens of the Retiro, were overthrown; and, at eleven o'clock, the French soldiers occupied the important posts of the Observatory, the China Manufactory, the Great Barracks, and the Palace of Medina Cœli. The cannonade then ceased, and another envoy was sent into the city, to demand its surrender. At five o'clock, in the afternoon, General Morla, chief of the Military Junta, and Don B. Yriarte, deputed from the city, departed for the head-quarters of the Emperor, with the French envoy, and were conducted to the tent of the Prince of Neufchatel. In the mean time, the inhabitants refused to lay down their arms, and continued to fire upon the French, from the windows of the houses, surrounding the public walk of the Prado.—Fifty thousand armed inhabitants, without any discipline, ran about the streets, vociferating for orders, and accusing their leaders of treason. The Captain-General, Marquis of Castellar, and other military men of rank, quitted Madrid during the night of the 3d, with the regular troops, and 16 pieces of cannon. On the 4th of December, at six o'clock in the morning, another deputation was dispatched from the city to the tent of the Prince of Neufchatel; and, at ten o'clock, the French troops took possession of the city.*

The news of the Spanish insurrection, soon reached Portugal: the inhabitants of Lisbon, kept in awe and subjection by the army of Junot, were prevented at first from manifesting their joy at the intelligence. At Oporto, however, circumstances were more favourable to the wishes and the efforts of the Portuguese. A considerable body of Spanish troops occupied that city; as soon as they were made acquainted with the occurrences in their own country, and had learnt that their services were required to avenge the captivity of their monarch, and to regain the independence and tranquillity of Spain, they determined to quit Oporto for the purpose of swelling the patriotic ranks of their countrymen. Before their departure, however, they took the French General and all his staff prisoners, and delivered up the government of the city to Louise d'Oliveda, who had filled that office before the arrival of the French. As soon as the Governor had resumed his functions, he ordered the Portuguese flag to be hoisted, and opened a friendly communication with the Captain of an English frigate, which was cruising off that port. The conduct of Oporto served as an example for the other parts of Portugal; nearly the whole of the north of that kingdom rose in arms against the French; the authority of the Prince Régent was re-established; and provincial Juntas, similar in their character and functions to those in Spain, were formed. Of these assemblies, the Junta of Oporto, in particular, turned their attention towards England for assistance and support; and the army of Sir Arthur Wellesley, which had, in the first instance, been offered to the Spaniards, ultimately disembarked in Portugal. His force, originally consisting of nearly 9000 men, was subsequently augmented, by reinforcements from the south of Spain, under Generals Anstruther and Ackland; and, from the Baltic, under Sir John Moore. On the arrival of the expedition at Oporto, on the 24th of July, the Commander-in-Chief was informed by the Bishop, that the Portuguese force in that quarter, was sufficient to repel the attacks of the enemy; and, after a consultation with Sir Charles Cotton, the British Admiral stationed off the Tagus, Sir Arthur Wellesley determined to effect a landing in the bay of Mondego, having previously given orders to General Spencer, to join him at that place. Receiving information that the army of General Junot, consisting of about 20,000 men, had been considerably weakened, owing to that General having found it necessary to dispatch General Loison, with about 6000 troops, into the province of Montejo, to quell an insurrection in the south of Portugal, Sir Arthur Wellesley commenced the disembarkation of the troops without delay. Soon after they had landed, the force under General Spencer arrived, and, on the 9th of August, advanced with the main body from Mondego bay, on the road to Lisbon. Unfortunately, a coolness arose between the Portuguese and the English Generals, owing to a demand, made by the former, for a supply of provisions from the British stores, with which it was found impossible to comply, without exposing the British troops to insufficient and precarious sustenance. In consequence of this difference, the Portuguese troops separated from the English; but, on the urgent representation of Sir Arthur Wellesley, and a promise on his part, to supply them with provisions, 1000 regular infantry, 400 light troops, and 250 cavalry, joined the British army at Alcobaca, on the evening of the 14th, with Colonel Trant, and continued with him, during the remainder of the operations. On the 15th, the advanced guard of the British army came up, for the first time, with a party of the French, at Oviedas, when a slight action took place, occasioned principally by the eagerness of the British to attack and pursue the enemy. On the 16th, the army halted, and the next day, Sir Arthur Wellesley formed the determination to attack General Laborde, at Roleia. This place is situated on an eminence, with a plain at the end of a valley on its front. On the hills on both sides this valley, the enemy had stationed his force, his right resting on the hills, the left on an eminence, and the whole covering and protecting the passes of the mountains which lay in his rear. The French force, thus strongly and advantageously posted, consisted of about 6000 men, with five pieces of cannon, and the British General having reason to believe that the right of the enemy would be strengthened by the arrival of a fresh force in the course of the night, under Loison, formed his plan of attack accordingly. The French were, in consequence, soon driven from their position, and compelled to retire, by the passes, into the mountains, where they occupied a very formidable position. A desperate battle ensued, attended with very considerable loss on the side of the British; but, at the close of the day, the enemy was driven from all the passes of the mountains, and part of the British troops reached the plains on their summit. The enemy, to cover the retreat of his defeated army, made three distinct, desperate, and gallant attacks upon the two regiments which first reached the mountains; in all of which he was completely repulsed; and his retreat might have been cut off, had the British army been supplied with the usual proportion of cavalry. The loss of the enemy, in this action, was very considerable, and three pieces of artillery fell into the hands of the British. Our loss in killed, wounded, and missing, amounted to nearly 500. On the 18th, the British army moved to Lourinha, in order to cover the debarkation of the troops under Generals Anstruther and Ackland, which took place on the 20th; and, on the 21st, they resumed

* Whilst Buonaparte was carrying on his schemes against Spain, he was not inattentive to her valuable possessions in America. As soon as he had procured from Charles and Ferdinand the abdication of the throne in his favour, he sent dispatches by different fast sailing vessels, to their principal settlements. Fortunately, most of these vessels were taken by the British cruisers, so that before the dispatches of Buonaparte appeared, the inhabitants of Spanish America were accurately informed of the events which had occurred in the mother country. On the arrival of such of the vessels as had escaped the British cruisers, the crews were seized and imprisoned. Hostilities were declared against France, in the Spanish West Indies, and in many parts of the main. Ferdinand the Seventh was proclaimed; the English were received and treated as friends; and voluntary contributions, in aid of the patriots, were raised, and transmitted to Europe.

their march towards Lisbon. Junot having been informed of the reinforcements which the British army expected, under the command of Sir John Moore, resolved, notwithstanding the defeat of his troops at Roleia, on the 17th, to attack the British force before their reinforcements arrived; for this purpose, he left Lisbon, with nearly the whole of his disposable force, amounting to about 14,000 men, and on the morning of the 21st, came up with the army under Sir Arthur Wellesley, at Vimiera. This village stands in a valley, through which runs the river Maceira; on the west and north of the village, is a mountain, the western point of which touches the sea, and the eastern is separated by a deep ravine from the heights, over which passes the road to Lourinha. The greater part of the British infantry, with eight pieces of artillery, were posted on this mountain, under Generals Hill and Ferguson. The riflemen, under General Fane, and the brigade of General Anstruther, were posted on a hill to the south-west of the village, which is entirely commanded by the mountain on which the troops under Generals Hill and Ferguson were stationed. The cavalry, and reserve of artillery, were placed in the valley between the hills. Soon after the enemy appeared, it became obvious that his intention was to attack the advanced guard on the left wing; and the positions of the British army were immediately changed in order to repel the threatened attack. The French army, formed into several columns, began their attack upon the whole of the troops on the heights in the south-east quarter, and they advanced on the left, notwithstanding the fire of the riflemen, close to the 50th regiment; but they were checked and driven back by the bayonets of that corps. The 43d regiment, forming the second battalion, was likewise closely engaged with them in the road which leads to Vimiera, a part of that corps having been placed in the church-yard, in order to prevent them penetrating into the town: here, also, the engagement commenced early in the day, and here, again, the enemy was repulsed by the bayonets of the 97th regiment, supported by the 52d regiment, which, by an advance in column, took the enemy in flank. On these points the British army had acted merely on the defensive; but General Anstruther, advancing for the purpose of occupying his position on the left, attacked their flank, which suffered severely from his fire, combined with the fire of the artillery, which was placed on the same heights as this brigade. The engagement on this eminence, was long and obstinately contested; but, at length, the French were repulsed, and thrown into complete confusion, leaving behind them, in their flight, seven pieces of cannon, and a great number of killed, wounded, and prisoners. A detachment of the 20th light dragoons pursued the retreating enemy; but, owing to their superiority in cavalry, this detachment suffered much, and Lieutenant-Colonel Taylor was unfortunately killed. Nearly at the same time, the enemy commenced an attack upon the heights on the road to Lourinha: a large body of cavalry supported this operation, which was begun with their usual impetuosity; Major-General Ferguson's brigade, consisting of the 36th, 40th, and 71st regiments, received this attack with steadiness. As soon as the enemy approached, they charged him, in their turn, and again he gave way before the rampart of British bayonets, with which he was resisted. As the enemy retreated, the British troops advanced; and, in their victorious career, took six pieces of cannon, and a great number of prisoners.—The last effort of the French was directed to the recovery of part of their artillery; for this purpose, they attacked the 71st and 82d regiments, which had halted in the valley, where the captured artillery lay. The attack was so impetuous, as to oblige the British regiments to retire from the low ground to the heights, which they had no sooner attained, than they faced about and fired upon the enemy, and ultimately compelled him to retire from the valley with great loss, and without having accomplished the object of his enterprise. In this action, in which the whole of the French force in Portugal, was employed, under the command of the Duke of Abrantes, in person; in which the enemy was certainly superior in cavalry and artillery, and in which not more than half of the British army was actually engaged, the French sustained a signal defeat, and lost 13 pieces of cannon, 23 ammunition-waggons, and 20,000 rounds of musket-ammunition, with about 3000 men killed, wounded, and prisoners; while the total loss of the British did not exceed 800. Sir Harry Burrard had joined the British army on the morning of the battle of Vimiera; but, with a feeling of delicacy towards Sir Arthur Wellesley, he declined assuming the command, till that General should have completed his operations. On the 22d, the day after the battle, Sir Hew Dalrymple, who had been ordered from his situation as Lieutenant-Governor of Gibraltar, for the purpose of taking the command of all the different corps sent by the British government into Portugal, reached Cintra, to which the British army had moved. A few hours after his arrival, a flag of truce came in from Junot, with a proposal for a cessation of hostilities, that a convention, by which the French should evacuate Portugal, might be agreed upon. An armistice was accordingly signed by General Kellerman, on the part of the French, and Sir Arthur Wellesley, on behalf of the English; the principal articles of which formed the basis of the convention of Cintra; by which it was strangely agreed, that the English government should be at the expense of transporting the whole of the French army to any of the ports in France, between Rochfort and L'Orient. When the army arrived in France, they were to be at liberty to serve again immediately. All the property of the French army, as well as the property of the individuals, was to be sacred and untouched, and might either be sold in Portugal, or carried off into France. The embarkation was to take place in three divisions; the first to sail within seven days from the date of the ratification of the convention. No native of Portugal was to be molested, or considered accountable for his political conduct, during the time the French had occupied that country; and such of them as were desirous of withdrawing into France, were to have full liberty to dispose of their property. When the insurrection in Spain first broke out, Junot had ordered a number of Spanish troops, serving in his army, into confinement in the ships in the harbour; and, in return for the delivering up of these Spaniards, the Commander-in-Chief of the British army engaged to obtain, from the Spanish Juntas, the release or restoration of such French subjects, either military or civil, as might have been detained in Spain, in consequence of the events that occurred about the end of May, and the beginning of June.

Respecting the Russian fleet, which, by the articles of the armistice, was to be allowed to depart from the Tagus without molestation, a convention was agreed to by Sir Charles Cotton, and Admiral Siniavin, the Russian Admiral, by which the ships and stores were to be delivered up immediately, and sent to England; there to be held as a deposit, and not to be restored till six months after the conclusion of a peace between Russia and Great Britain. The Russian Admiral, officers, seamen, and marines, were to be allowed to return to Russia, at the expense of the British government, without any stipulation with regard to their future services. In Portugal, as well as in England, the terms of the convention produced universal discontent. General Benardin Freire, commander of the Portuguese troops, entered a formal protest against the convention; and the coolness and alienation which had already so unfortunately taken place, were, by this means, aggravated to a degree nearly approaching to open hostility. On the 15th of September, the French troops completed their embarkation; and, on that day, Portugal was completely freed from the presence of an enemy, who, for ten months, had inflicted upon the country the most severe calamities.

The British troops, however, did not begin their march towards Spain, till two months after the ratification fication of the convention of Cintra; and, even then, upwards of 10,000 men were left behind. The fatal convention of Cintra drew after it a long train of disaster and disgrace. One of its first effects was to suspend all the operations of the army, and Sir Hew Dalrymple, Sir Harry Burrard, and Sir Arthur Wellesley, were all summoned to England, in consequence of the enquiry which it was seen proper to institute into that proceeding. The command of the British army was now vested in Sir John Moore—an officer who had distinguished himself in the West Indies, in Holland, and in Egypt, and who had recently returned from Sweden, where he had been employed as Commander-in-Chief. The British army destined to act in favour of the Spaniards, and to assist in expelling the French invaders from that country, consisted of the troops which marched from Lisbon, on the 27th of October, under the command of Sir John Moore, and those which had been sent from England, under the command of Sir David Baird. The latter arrived at Corunna, on the 13th of October, and Sir David Baird was astonished and disappointed to find that the Junta of Galicia at first refused him permission to land his troops; and when their tardy acquiescence was obtained, his reception was so extremely cold and dispiriting, that he doubted whether the reluctance of the Spanish government, to the French oppression, had yet been overcome. The same impression was made on Sir John Moore, when he arrived at Salamanca, on the 13th of November; and this officer wrote from that place to the British minister at Madrid, desiring him frankly to inform the Spanish government, that if they expected his army to advance, they must prepare themselves to pay more attention to its wants. The farther Sir John Moore advanced into Spain, the more strongly was he impressed with the conviction, that the information, upon the faith of which he had crossed the frontiers of Portugal, was destitute of foundation. He had been officially informed, that his entry into Spain would be covered by between 60 and 70,000 men; but, he had now advanced within three marches of the French army, and not even a Spanish picquet had appeared to protect his front. All the principal Spanish armies were beaten and dispersed; Burgos was in possession of the French; and even Valladolid had been entered, and occupied by their cavalry. Under these circumstances, Sir John Moore determined to retreat; but, before he could put his determination into effect, he received a communication from Mr. Frere, the British ambassador at Madrid, which induced him to advance to that capital. Accordingly, the main body of the army having been joined by General Hope's division, they advanced towards Valladolid, with the corps under Sir David Baird, in their rear.

Before they had proceeded a day's march on their route, Sir John Moore learnt, by an intercepted dispatch, that Buonaparte, who had entered Madrid, on the 4th of December, was advancing towards Lisbon, and that a body of 18,000 men, under Soult, was posted at Saldana, on the banks of the Carrion. Sir John, anxious to meet the wishes of his troops, by leading them against the enemy, and willing to embrace any opportunity of benefitting the Spanish cause, quitted his route towards Valladolid, and by a movement on the left, having effected his junction with Sir David Baird, advanced by rapid marches to the Carrion. Here the advanced posts of the two armies first met, and the superiority of the British cavalry, under Lord Paget, was eminently displayed in a most brilliant and successful skirmish. But, just as Sir John Moore had issued his orders for the main body of the army to commence a general attack, and had requested the Marquis of Romana to co-operate with his forces, he received, from different quarters, information that Buonaparte, in person, was advancing with his army, to get into the rear of the British; that the army which had been stationed at Talavera, had moved forward to Salamanca, and that Soult himself had received strong reinforcements. There was now no alternative: a retreat had become indispensable, and the only difficulty lay in the route that ought to be pursued. The numbers of the French army that were now dispatched against Sir John Moore, amounted to upwards of 70,000. The corps of Soult, before it was reinforced, consisted of 18,000 men; the right flank of the British was threatened by Junot, who, liberated by the convention of Cintra, from his perilous situation in Portugal, had now again advanced into Spain, with 15,000 men; while Buonaparte, who had quitted Madrid on the 18th, with 40,000 troops, was, at this moment, advancing, with his usual rapidity, upon the British force. So rapid was the march of the main body of the French army, under Buonaparte, and so closely did they pursue Sir John Moore, that the advanced guard of the enemy reached Tordesillas on the same day that the British began to retreat from Sahagun. At Benevente, the cavalry, and part of the artillery of Buonaparte's army, came up with the rear of the British, and another skirmish took place, which terminated greatly to the glory and honour of the British cavalry, and in which the French General, Lefevre, at the head of his chasseurs, was taken prisoner. This check served to convince Buonaparte, that his main force could not come up with Sir John Moore, before he had quitted Benevente; and his presence being required in France, he committed the further prosecution of the pursuit to Marshal Soult, the Duke of Dalmatia, who, with three divisions under his command, was ordered to follow the British without intermission, and to effect their destruction. The situation of the British army was, at this time, dispiriting in the extreme. In the midst of winter, in a dreary and desolate country, the soldiers chilled and drenched by deluges of rain, and wearied by long and rapid marches, were almost destitute of fuel to cook their victuals, and it was with extreme difficulty, that they procured shelter. Their provisions were scanty, irregular, and difficult of attainment; the waggons, in which were their magazines, baggage, and stores, were often deserted in the night by the Spanish drivers, terrified by the approach of the French. Thus, baggage, ammunition, stores, and even money, were frequently obliged to be destroyed, to prevent them from falling into the hands of the enemy; and the weak, the sick, and the wounded, were necessarily left behind. In the midst of these distresses, the Spanish peasantry are said to have offered no assistance, and shewed no sympathy; on the contrary, though armed, they fled at the approach of the English, carrying with them every thing that could alleviate their distress, or contribute to their preservation or comfort. The difficulties and anxiety of the British commander were increased by the relaxation which took place in the discipline of his army. The disappointment which they experienced, in not being allowed to measure their strength with the enemy; the privations and distresses under which they laboured, in a retreat which they considered as a disgraceful and unnecessary flight; and, above all, the indifference to their sufferings, which the Spaniards uniformly manifested; contributed to weaken their habits of order and subordination. Sir John Moore, aware of the consequences to which this want of discipline might lead, found himself reluctantly compelled to issue such orders as might unequivocally point out his sense of so great an evil; and that might, at the same time, express his unalterable determination to punish, in the most severe and exemplary manner, every future offender.*—The enemy was now pressing hard upon the British,

* The opponents of ministers had much to say, on the subject of General Moore's appointment to the chief command, in the Peninsula; and, it must be confessed, that the melancholy result of the campaign more than justified all their reasoning, and all their invective. Sir John, it is well known, had no confidence in the exertions of the Spaniards, or in the success of their cause. On the contrary, his prejudices were strong against them; and, from the commencement, he considered himself to be playing a losing game. An officer so impressed, ought never to be entrusted with a command; for, instead of the fire of enterprise—that noble confidence, which frequently ensures success, even against every calculation of probability—the chill of circumspection, and the frost of despair, are to be apprehended. By military British, and Sir John Moore, having dispatched General Crawford's division, consisting of 3000 men, to Vigo, came to the determination to halt at Lugo, at which place he arrived on the 5th of January, 1809, and to offer them battle; but Soult did not think it safe to attack the British in the strong and judicious position they had taken up near this place. Sir John Moore, not judging it prudent either to act offensively, or to delay his retreat, quitted his ground in the night of the 9th, leaving his fires burning to deceive the enemy. On the 11th, the whole of the British army reached Corunna, with the exception of General Crawford's division, which had embarked at Vigo; but, unfortunately the transports had not yet arrived, and the next morning, the French army, under the Duke of Dalmatia, were seen approaching Corunna. On examining the different positions in the neighbourhood, Sir John Moore determined to occupy a range of hills near the town, and on the 13th, he made the following arrangement of his army:—One division, under General Hope, occupied a hill on the left, commanding the road to Betanzos; the division, under Sir David Baird, extended from this village, and bending to the right, the whole formed a sort of crescent; the rifle corps on the side of Sir David Baird formed a chain across a valley, and communicated with General Fraser's division, which was drawn up near the road to Vigo, about half a mile from Corunna; and the reserve, under Major-General Paget, occupied a village on the Betanzos road, about half a mile in the rear of General Hope.

On the 14th, in the evening, the transports appointed to convoy the British army to their native shores, hove in sight. On the 15th the enemy advanced to the height opposite the British position. About noon, on the 16th, he began to place some guns in the front of the right and left of his line, and followed up this preparatory movement by a rapid attack upon the division of General Baird. When the enemy's line first began to assume a hostile attitude, Sir John Moore was employed in visiting the outposts, and in explaining to the general officers his plans for conducting the embarkation. Surprised, but by no means disconcerted by this intelligence, he flew to the field of battle, expressing his regret that the advanced hour of the day would not allow the British army to reap all the advantages of that victory which he felt assured now awaited them. The first attack of the enemy was directed against the right wing of the British, and Sir John Moore, aware that this was his vulnerable point, placed himself in front of the position, to animate and to direct the operations of his troops. Early in the engagement, Sir David Baird, the second in command, while leading his division, had his arm dreadfully shattered by a grape-shot, and was in consequence oliged to quit the field. An attempt was now made by the French to turn the right flank of the British line; but this manœuvre was completely defeated by the 4th regiment falling back, and opening a flanking fire upon the assailants. Sir John Moore, after exclaiming—"that is exactly what I wished," rode up to the 50th regiment, and directed them to charge the enemy; this order they obeyed, notwithstanding the intervention of an inclosure in front, and the enemy was driven out of the village of Elvina with great slaughter. The General next proceeded to the 42d, who, being addressed by him in the flattering and proud words, "Highlanders, remember Egypt!" charged the French with irresistible impetuosity, and forced their ranks to retreat. His career was now drawing to a close: and at the moment when Captain Hardinge was reporting to him that the guards were advancing to the assistance of the 42d, a cannon ball from the enemy's battery struck Sir John Moore, and carrying away his left shoulder and part of the collar bone, left his arm hanging to his body by the flesh. The violence of the stroke threw him to the ground; but so composed and unaltered was his countenance, and so earnestly was his mind fixed upon the advancing Highlanders, that for a few moments it was hoped that he had been rather stunned than materially hurt by the shot. It was soon, however, discovered that the wound was mortal, and the expiring hero was prevailed upon to suffer himself to be removed to the rear. On his way from the field, he ordered Captain Hardinge to report his wound to General Hope, who now assumed the command.* The soldiers, although aware of the situation of their chief, continued to support the contest with undiminished constancy. The attack of the French upon the right of the British line was completely repulsed; and they were, in their turn, obliged to draw back their left flank, to prevent it from being turned. Their next attempt was against the centre; but there they were successfully resisted by Generals Manningham and Leigh. The last effort of the enemy was directed against the left of the British army, but they were almost instantly driven back with loss; and although the discharge of cannon, and the report of musketry, continued till night put an end to the operations, at four o'clock in the afternoon the English had taken up a position in advance, and victory was no longer doubtful. General Hope, aware of the approaching succours of the French army, and of the circumstances under which the British troops were placed, judged it advisable to proceed in the embarkation, for which indeed the preparatory measures had been taken by Sir John Moore. Accordingly, about ten o'clock on the night of the 16th, the troops quitted their position, and marched into Corunna, where the embarkation for England immediately commenced; and so well concerted were the arrangements, that during the night, and in the course of the following day, the whole army, including the sick and wounded, were placed on board the transports without molestation from the enemy.†

military men, Sir John Moore is considered to have been guilty of a double error: first, in not retreating sufficiently early; secondly, in not fighting the enemy, whilst yet the spirits of his army were high, and their physical powers unimpaired. Eager for the battle, and confident of the victory, they might then have humbled the vaunting superiority of the French. Far different was the prospect, when, enraged by disappointment, and exhausted by the labours and privations of a retreat, perhaps the most dreadful upon record, they were compelled to face the overwhelming numbers of a pursuing foe.—Nor do the Spaniards appear to be deserving of all the opprobrium which has been cast upon their conduct. Instead of conciliating the prejudices of the ignorant, superstitious, and bigotted population, the British army—lamentable to say, officers as well as men—seemed to emulate each other, in violating the common decencies of life. Individuals are even known to have been guilty of atrocities, which, it had been hoped, the French were the only nation upon earth that could be capable of perpetrating.—Sir John Moore's bravery, no man ever questioned; but the moral discipline of his army was such as to leave a stain, almost indelible, on the British character.

* Colonel Anderson thus relates the particulars of the last moments of Sir John Moore. "I met the General in the evening of the 16th of January conveyed off the field in a blanket and sashes. He knew me immediately, though it was almost dark, squeezed me by the hand, and said, 'Anderson, don't leave me.' He spoke to the surgeons on their examining his wounds, but was in such pain that he could say little. After some time he seemed very anxious to speak to me, and, at intervals, got out as follows: 'Anderson, you know that I have always wished to die this way.' He then asked, 'Are the French beaten?' which he repeated to every one he knew, as they came in. 'I hope the people of England will be satisfied!—I hope my country will do me justice!—Anderson, you will see my friends as soon as you can—Tell them—every thing—Say to my mother'—Here his voice quite failed, and he was excessively agitated.—'Hope—Hope—I have much to say to him,—but cannot get it out—are Colonel Graham—and all my aides-de-camp, well?—I have made my will, and have remembered my servants.—Colborne has my will,—and all my papers.'—Major Colborne then came into the room. He spoke most kindly to him, and then said to me, 'Anderson, remember you go to ——, and tell him it is my request, and that I expect he will give Major Colborne a Lieutenant-Colonelcy.—He has been long with me,—and I know him most worthy of it.' He then asked Major Colborne, 'if the French were beaten?' and, on being told they were on every point, he said, 'It's a great satisfaction to me to know we have beaten the French.—Is Paget in the room?' On my telling him, no; he said, 'remember me to him.'—It's General Paget I mean—he is a fine fellow.—I feel myself so strong—I fear I shall be long dying.—It is great uneasiness—It is great pain.' He thanked the surgeons for their trouble. Captains Percy and Stanhope, two of his aides-de-camp, then came into the room. He spoke kindly to both, and asked Percy, 'if his aides-de-camp were well?' After some interval, he said, 'Stanhope,—remember me to your sister.' He pressed my hand close to his body, and in a few minutes died without a struggle."

† It is said to have always been the wish of Sir John Moore to die upon the field of battle, and it was his earnest request that he should be buried where he fell. This request was strictly complied with. At midnight

At the commencement of the present year, Austria, hitherto the principal ally of Britain, went over to the enemy. The ostensible cause of this conduct was a refusal, by the English cabinet, to accept the mediation of Austria for a peace between great Britain and France. To the English ministers, the overtures appeared too vague and indeterminate to authorize the opening of a negociation; Stahremberg, the Austrian ambassador, presenting no authenticated document from the French ruler, nor giving any intimation of the basis on which it was proposed to treat. His Britannic Majesty, however, expressed his readiness to enter into a negociation, on such grounds of equality, as might embrace the interests of the allies of both powers. This offer was not accepted, and a rupture ensued between Britain and Austria.

The predominating influence of France was also apparent in the north of Europe. In the month of February, a Russian army entered the Swedish province of Finland, and war was respectively declared by the courts of St. Petersburgh and Stockholm. Christian VII. King of Denmark, died about the same time, and the Crown Prince, who, from the imbecility of his father, had long conducted the affairs of government, assumed the sceptre by the name of Frederic VI. His accession was followed by a declaration of war against Sweden. The spirited sovereign of that state, already involved in a war with France and Russia, immediately prepared to meet the combination of dangers by which he was threatened. As, however, the resources of h's territory were inadequate to the contest, the English government granted him a subsidy of 100,000*l.* per month, with 10,000 land forces on board, to afford such aid as the circumstances of the war might demand. Unfortunately, however, a disagreement arose between the Swedish monarch and Sir John Moore, the English General, respecting their military plans, which prevented their co-operation, and ultimately caused the return of the armament. The war between Russia and Sweden was chiefly confined to Finland, and to unimportant naval actions in the Baltic. Between Sweden and Denmark, the contest was still more trivial.*

Buonaparte, this year, effected considerable changes in the affairs of Italy. He adopted his son-in-law, Eugene Beauharnois, as his own son, and settled that kingdom upon him in tail male; expressly stating, however, that the right which Eugene received by adoption should never in any case authorise him or his descendants to bring forward any claim or pretension to the crown of France, the succession of which was "irrevocably" fixed. The kingdom of Naples was bestowed upon Joachim Murat, brother-in-law of Buonaparte. Whilst these changes were taking place in Italy, an order of hereditary nobility was created in France; and it was expressly declared that hereditary distinctions are, in some measure, essential to monarchial government.†

midnight the corpse was carried to the citadel of Corunna by Colonel Graham, Major Colborne, and the aides-de-camp, and deposited in Colonel Graham's quarters. A grave was dug on the ramparts by a party of the 9th regiment, the aides-de-camp attending by turns. No coffin could be procured, and the body was never undressed, but wrapped up by the officers of his staff in a military cloak and blankets. At eight o'clock in the morning of the 17th the interment took place; the officers of his family bore the body to the grave; the funeral service was read by the chaplain; and the earth received the remains of the departed hero. A monument has since been erected over his remains.

* The British squadron, which was sent to the Baltic, under the command of Sir Samuel Hood, having joined the Swedish Admiral, Nauckhoff, with the Centaur and Implacable, sailed on the 25th of August, in quest of the Russian fleet. On the day following the Russians were discovered off Hango Hudd. The British ships out-sailed their allies; and about five o'clock on the following morning, the Implacable brought the Sewoled, of 74 guns, to close action. In the course of twenty minutes the enemy's ship was completely silenced, and her colours struck. The British commander used every manœuvre to bring on a general action, but the Russian Admiral aware of his intention, took refuge in the port of Rogerswick. The Russian ship which had engaged with the Implacable, grounded at the entrance of the harbour, and an attempt was made by Sir Samuel Hood in the Centaur to bring her off, but owing to the shallowness of the water, it was found impossible to get her afloat. Sir Samuel Hood finding all his endeavours fruitless, took the prisoners out of the Russian ship and set fire to her. As soon as the Russian squadron had entered the port of Rogerswick, the men were employed in fortifying the harbour against the attacks of the combined fleet, and so successful were their exertions, that every attempt to injure the Russian ships proved ineffectual.

† The following statement, of what has been designated the "Mock Court of St. Cloud," with the dignities conferred by Buonaparte upon his family and adherents, forms an interesting illustration of modern French History:—

Napoleon Buonaparte—a Corsican, son of the Town Clerk of Ajaccio; Emperor of the French, King of Italy, Protector of the Confederation of the Rhine, and Mediator of Switzerland.

Josephine Buonaparte—wife of the former, widow of General Beauharnois, Mistress of Barras, and repudiated by Napoleon; Empress Queen.

———Davoust—of a noble family; Prince of Eckmuhl and Duke of Auerstadt.

Marshal

British Parliament this year, embraced the great public question which afterwards engaged the attention of the legislature; and the expedition to Copenhagen, the relation of England with foreign states, and the orders which his Majesty had issued in council, retaliating upon France her decrees against the commerce of Great Britain, formed prominent features in that document. In the Lords, the address to the throne was moved by the Earl of Galloway, and seconded by Lord Kenyon; and in the Commons moved by Lord Hamilton, and seconded by Mr. C. Ellis. In both Houses it was carried without a division. During the session of Parliament, the opposition to ministers was unusually keen, vigilant, and persevering; notwithstanding, which, their majorities were generally great. On the 29th of February, Mr. Whitbread rose to propose certain resolutions of censure against ministers for their rejection of the proferred mediation of Russia and Austria, accompanied by a declaration, that there was nothing in the present circumstances of the war which ought to preclude his Majesty from entering into a negociation with the enemy for the termination of hostilities. His first resolution, however, was negatived by 210 against 70 voices; and the two which followed by still larger majorities.*

On the 9th of February, Sir Francis Burdett observed, that it was stated in some of the newspapers that certain large sums arising from the droits of admiralty, had been granted by his Majesty to several princes of the blood, and particularly that 20,000*l*, arising in this way, had lately been granted to the Duke of York. If this were really the case, he wished to ask, on what colour or pretext it was that the King came to seize on that property, and to dispose of it in such a manner? Mr. Perceval admitted that the sum of 20,000*l*. had been granted to the Duke of York, being only equal to the sums formerly granted to the other younger male branches of the royal family from the same fund. The condemnation of the property alluded to was, he said, a judicial act of the court before which it came to be tried, and the right of his Majesty to these droits resolved itself into two distinct parts: the right of the crown, and his right as Lord High Admiral. As to the appropriation of the fund, a considerable proportion of it had been granted to captors under various circumstances; many grants had been made for the public service; relief had in some cases been afforded to the sufferers by the sudden breaking out of the war; and the fund being completely under his Majesty's controul, grants had been occasionally made to the younger branches of the royal family. Sir Francis Burdett, after observing that the proceeds alluded to amounted to such a considerable sum, that he was convinced Parliament could never endure that it should be left as the private property of the King, moved, with a view to an ulterior inquiry, "That there be laid before the House an account of the net proceeds paid out of the court of admiralty to the receiver-general of droits, of all property condemned to his Majesty in right of the crown, or in right of the office of Lord High Admiral, since the 1st of January, 1793, with the balances now remaining." This motion was carried.

On the 8th of March, when the mutiny bill came under consideration, in the Commons, Lord Castlereagh, referring to Mr. Windham's system, said, he had no objection to limited service under certain modifications; but he thought that it ought not to be enforced to the exclusion of unlimited service, where men were perfectly satisfied, and desirous to enter without limitation. With these views, the honourable gentleman moved, that a clause should be introduced into the mutiny bill, allowing such men as were inclined to enter the service, a fair option of enlisting for life; and after an animated debate, the proposition of the noble secretary was carried by 169 against 100. Another measure, relating to the army and internal defence of the country, was submitted to the House by Lord Castlereagh on the 12th of April. His object was to create a force subsidiary to the regular militia, amounting to 00,000 men. This body he proposed should form a local militia, and should be ballotted for in the different counties, in proportion to the deficiency of volunteers of each, from among persons between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five. Volunteer corps might, if they chose, transfer themselves, with the approbation of his Majesty, into this local militia. The period of service during the year to be eight-and-twenty days, for which pay was to be allowed. This measure encountered strenuous opposition, but the bill was ultimately passed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not this year find himself under the necessity of increasing the public burden, except in a very trifling degree. By an arrangement with the Bank of England, half a million of the unclaimed dividends were obtained for immediateuse; a reduction in the charges of the bank for superintending the pecuniary concerns of the public was effected to the amount of 64,000*l*.; and a loan of 3,000,000*l*. was granted by the directors to government, without interest.

Marshal Junot—servant of a farmer; in 1792, a volunteer in a grenadier corps; in 1796, one of Buonaparte's aides-de-camp; Duke of Abrantes.
——Moncey—servant of a nobleman whose name he assumed; Duke of Cornegliano.
——Mortier—a cidevant merchant's clerk at Dunkirk, Captain of a volunteer corps in 1793; Duke of Treviso.
——Macdonald—an officer in the Irish Legion before the Revolution; Duke of Tarento.
——Marmont—of a noble family; Duke of Ragusa.
——Oudinot—son of a shopkeeper of the town of Bar; Duke of Reggio.
——Ney—son of a cutler of Saar Louis, a hussar, an Adjutant-General in 1726; Prince of Moskwa, and Duke of Elchingen.
——Lefebvre—son of a miller of Alsace, a Serjeant in the Guards before the Revolution; Duke of Dantzig.
——Massena—formerly a Serjeant in the army of the King of Sardinia; Prince of Essling, and Duke of Rivoli.
——Soult—a subaltern before the Revolution; Duke of Dalmatia.
——Suchet—a barber at Lyons; Duke of Albufera.
——Kellerman—a German by birth, and an officer in the French service before the Revolution; Duke of Valmy.
——Victor—originally a drummer; Duke of Belluno.
——Bessieres—a common soldier in 1796, a Captain of infantry in the army of Italy; Duke of Istria.
General Hulin—the leader of most of the massacres in Paris; Count of the Empire, and Governor of Paris.
—— Baraguay d'Hilliers;—Count of the Empire.
—— Loison—son of an attorney; Count of the Empire, and Governor of the Imperial Palace.
—— Rapp—originally a livery servant, a man of good character, Count of the Empire, and First Aid-de-Camp to Buonaparte.
—— Andreossi—descended from an ancient family, a man of considerable talent; Count of the Empire.
General Vandamme—a cruel sanguinary villain; Count of the Empire, and Commandant of Boulogne.
—— Sebastiani—a Corsican by birth, and a relation of the Imperial family; Count of the Empire.

* On the 21st of January, Mr. Bankes had reminded the House of Commons, that a bill for preventing the grant of places in reversion had passed through that House during the last session, and was only prevented from going to the Lords by the prorogation of Parliament. The House then thought the bill which he now should move for, to be of so important a nature, that they judged it necessary to present a petition to the crown, to which his Majesty had been pleased to return a most gracious answer; and he now moved, that leave be given to bring in a bill to prevent the grant of offices and reversions during life, or with benefit of survivorship. This notice gave rise to some discussion, but the bill passed through all its stages in the Commons this year, as it had done in the preceding session, almost without opposition. When the bill reached the House of Lords, it was supported by several of his Majesty's ministers, and the friends to the measure in the country augured a favourable issue; but on the second reading, on the 1st of March, a strenuous opposition to its further progress was commenced by Lord Arden, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Redesdale, and the Duke of Montrose; and in a more advanced stage of the proceedings the bill was thrown out by a majority of eighty voices. Conceiving, however, that it was incumbent upon the House of Commons, not to abandon a measure so clearly connected with their public duty, Mr. Bankes, on the 7th of April, introduced another reversionary bill, similar in its object, but limited as to duration. By this modified measure it was proposed, that the crown should be restricted from granting offices in reversion for one year after the passing of the act, and from the close of that period to the end of six weeks from the commencement of the subsequent session of Parliament. This limitation was proposed for the sake of harmony between the two branches of the legislature, and with an understanding, that the friends to economical reform gave up no part of the principle of the bill, but looked forward to the further object of rendering the measure permanent. The bill thus modified was ultimately passed in the Upper House.

rest, till six months after the termination of the war.

Sir Samuel Romilly, who, in common with many other enlightened men, had long lamented, that in the criminal law of the country, capital punishments were appointed to be inflicted for so many crimes, on the 18th of May, obtained permission to introduce a bill into Parliament, which subsequently passed into a law, to repeal so much of the act of the 8th Elizabeth, cap. 4, as made privately stealing a capital crime, without benefit of clergy.

The cause of the Spanish patriots had awakened the zeal, and animated the enthusiasm of the people of this country, to a degree almost unexampled; and Mr. Sheridan seemed only to be the organ of the public voice, when he rose in the House of Commons, on the 15th of June, to direct the attention of the legislature to the affairs of Spain, and to demand their utmost exertions in favour of the Spaniards.

Mr. Canning, in reply, declared that his Majesty's ministers saw with a deep and lively interest, the noble struggle which a part of the Spanish nation was now making to resist the unexampled atrocity of France, and to preserve the independence of their country; and assured the House, that there existed the strongest disposition, on the part of the British government, to afford every practicable aid in a contest so magnanimous.—On the 4th of July, Parliament was prorogued, and the commissioners, speaking in his Majesty's name, declared, that he would continue to make every exertion in his power, for the support of the Spanish cause, guided in the choice and direction of his exertions by the wishes of those in whose behalf they were employed.

A. D. 1809.] It was naturally to be expected, that Austria, whose strength had been broken by the disasters of Ulm and Austerlitz, and whose dominion and resources had been curtailed by the peace of Presburg, should endeavour to avail herself of the first opportunity to regain her ancient independence and power. Accordingly, from the period of the conferences at Erfurth, till Buonaparte crossed the Pyrenees for the purpose of putting himself at the head of his armies in Spain, she went on completing her military preparations. These advances towards a state of hostility, were not viewed by France with indifference; and, from Valladolid, Buonaparte sent his mandate to the Princes of the Confederation of the Rhine, to furnish their contingents, and to hold themselves in readiness for war: soon afterwards he left Spain, and returned to Paris. In the month of March, the preparations for war were prosecuted by both parties with uncommon vigour and activity. The Austrian army was divided into nine corps, each consisting of from 30 to 40,000 men. The Archduke Charles, freed from the interference of the Aulic Council, was appointed Generalissimo; and six out of the nine corps were placed under his immediate command; the seventh corps was sent under the Archduke Ferdinand, into Poland; and the eighth and ninth to Italy, under the Archduke John. There were also two corps of reserve, one of them, consisting of 20,000 men, commanded by Prince John of Lichtenstein, and the other of 10,000 men, under General Kinmayer; exclusively of the partizan corps, and the landwehr, or militia, by which the force at the disposal of the Commander-in-Chief, was raised to 400,000. The force on which Buonaparte principally relied at the commencement of the war, consisted of the troops of Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Saxony, and the other contingents from the Confederation of the Rhine. The Bavarians were formed into three divisions, under the Duke of Dantzic, to whom the temporary command of the allied troops was confided till the arrival of Buonaparte. In the mean time, the whole of the north and west of Germany, and the interior of France, were stripped of troops, which proceeded, by rapid marches, towards the banks of the Danube. On the side of Italy, Prince Eugene, the Viceroy of that country, had concentrated a formidable army; and the Saxon troops, under the Prince of Ponte Corvo, were stationed in the neighbourhood of Dresden, to protect that capital from the Austrian army in Bohemia.

On the 9th of April, the Archduke Charles, having established his head-quarters at Dintz, sent formal notice to the French General commanding in Bavaria, that he had received orders from the Emperor Francis, to advance with the troops under his command, and to treat as enemies all who should oppose him. This notice served as intimation to the King of Bavaria, who, quitting his capital, repaired to Augsburg. On the following day, the Austrians threw a bridge of boats over the Inn, between Brannau and Scharding, and after crossing that river, advanced slowly into Bavaria.

Three days afterwards, Buonaparte having learned by the telegraph, that the Austrians had crossed the Inn, quitted Paris, and arrived at Donawarth, on the 17th; from which place he removed his head-quarters to Ingolstadt. On the 19th, the Duke of Auerstadt advanced to the village of Pressing, where he met a division of the Austrian army; and an engagement immediately took place, which ended in the defeat of the latter. On the same day, another French corps attacked an Austrian division in front, while the Bavarian troops, under the command of the Duke of Dantzic, fell upon their rear, and completed their rout.

Buonaparte, during the few days which he had passed with the army, had made himself completely acquainted with its positions; and had so far ascertained the situation of the country, as to be able to take advantage of the errors of his enemy. The Archduke Louis and General Keller had imprudently drawn their divisions to so great a distance from the other corps of the Austrian army, as at once to present a weak point of attack to the French, and to expose the troops under the Archduke Charles, to disorder or destruction.—Buonaparte, perceiving this mistake, resolved to profit by it, and immediately attacked the Archduke in front at Ebensberg. A brigade of light infantry, two battalions of horse artillery, and nearly the whole of the cavalry, commenced the attack: the Austrians having taken up their position on broken and intersected ground, were quickly dislodged; the infantry, chiefly composed of the troops of Wurtemberg and Bavaria, formed in column; and the Austrians, compelled to fall back, retreated in all directions, and in extreme disorder, before the victorious confederates, who, in this battle, took 8 standards, 12 pieces of cannon, and 8000 prisoners. The flank of the Austrian army having been completely laid open by the battle of Ebensberg, Buonaparte lost not a moment in advancing to Landshut. The Austrian cavalry, which had formed before the city, was attacked, and driven back, by the Duke of Istria; the same fate awaited the infantry: and the town, with 30 pieces of cannon, 9000 prisoners, and all the magazines established at that place, fell into the hands of the enemy. At two o'clock in the afternoon of the 22d, Buonaparte arrived opposite Eckmuhl, where four corps of the Austrians, amounting to 110,000 men, under the immediate command of the Archduke Charles, were already posted. Never before had these chiefs been opposed to each other, and as neither of them had ever yet experienced a defeat, the utmost confidence reigned in their respective armies. Buonaparte's military eye immediately perceived that the left wing of the Austrian army was disadvantageously posted. This wing he ordered the Duke of Montebello to attack, while the front of the Anstrians was opposed by the main body of the French. The contest was long and obstinate, but at the close of the day, the left wing of the Archduke's army was turned, and having been driven from all his positions, he was compelled to retreat. A large body of the Austrians, endeavouring to make a stand, under the covert of the woods, in the neighbourhood of Ratisbon, were driven into the plain, and suffered dreadfully from the French cavalry. An attempt to cover the retreat of the main body of the army, by the cavalry, was equally unsuccessful; the covering corps were attacked on both wings, but after maintaining their ground a considerable time, they were obliged to give way, and to seek their safety in flight. The Archduke Charles narrowly escaped being taken. Under cover of night, the broken and discomfited divisions of the Austrian army collected at Ratisbon, where they endeavoured to make a stand; but, after three successive charges, they gave way, leaving the field covered with 8000 of their slain. The French troops, following up their successes, entered the city through a breach in the fortifications; here a sanguinary engagement took place, in which six Austrian regiments were either cut to pieces or taken prisoners; and the remainder, not having had time to break down the bridge, were closely pursued to the left bank of the Rhine.

In these battles, Buonaparte pursued his usual plan, of breaking the enemy's forces into detached parts, and then attacking them separately; and the Austrians, uninstructed by experience, had so disposed their troops as to favour his operations. At Ebensberg, the two divisions of the Archduke Louis, and General Keller, were beaten separately; at Landshut, Buonaparte broke through the centre of their communications, and took their magazines and artillery; and, in the battle of Eckmuhl, he defeated the remaining divisions of the Austrian army of the Danube, except that of General Bellegarde, which did not join the Archduke till the day after his disaster. In the battles of Eckmuhl and Ratisbon, the French army took upwards of 20,000 prisoners, and the greater part of the Austrian artillery; and, in the short space of five days, the Austrians had lost 40,000 men, and 100 pieces of cannon. On the 10th of May, Buonaparte, without encountering any formidable resistance in his way from Ratisbon, appeared before the gates of Vienna. The Archduke Maximilian, to whom the command of the city was intrusted, animated and encouraged the citizens to resistance, as long as the imperfect nature of the fortifications, and their unskilfulness in the art of war, would permit. For four-and-twenty hours the French howitzers played upon the town; but their fire, though destructive, did not shake the constancy of the inhabitants. When, however, the enemy had succeeded in crossing the smaller branches of the Danube, by means of the numerous craft which are constantly on that river, and when the communication with the left bank was on the point of being cut off, surrender bebecame indispensable, and the regular troops, amounting to about 4000, effected their retreat by means of the great bridge of Taba, to which they soon afterwards set fire. The Emperor, in anticipation of the advance of the French to Vienna, had quitted that city soon after the defeat of the Archduke, and had taken up his abode at Znaim, in Moravia.

After the battle of Eckmuhl, the Archduke Charles crossed to the north side of the Danube, and retreating in the direction of Bohemia, attempted to gain the capital, by forced marches, before the arrival of the French. But the capture of Vienna was an object of too much importance not to be attempted by Buonaparte, with all his powers, and when the Archduke had advanced to Meissau, and before he could form a junction with General Keller, he learned, to his extreme mortification, that the Archduke Maximilian had been obliged to capitulate with the French, for the surrender of the city. Deprived, by this capture, of a point of support for the operations of his army, the Archduke fixed his head-quarters, on the 16th of May, at Enzersdorf, the chain of his outposts extending on the right as far as Krems, while Presburg, lower down the river, was occupied by his left. The advanced guards were, at the same time, pushed forward on the banks of the Danube, and the cavalry was posted on the margin of a small rivulet, on ground covered and partly concealed by bushes. Buonaparte lost not a moment in forming the determination to attack the Archduke Charles in his new position, and for this purpose, the French army was marched down the south bank of the river to Ebersdorf, where two islands of unequal dimensions divide the river into three branches, of the breadth of about 200 yards each. On the 19th of May, the French engineers threw two bridges from the right bank of the Danube to the smaller island; and, on the 20th, two other bridges were erected from that island to the Isle of In-der-Lobau, which forms a convenient rendezvous for troops, and where Buonaparte fixed his head-quarters. In three hours, a bridge, consisting of fifteen pontoons, was thrown over that arm of the river which separates Lobau from the Marsh Field, and the Archduke having formed the resolution not to interrupt the passage of the enemy, they were permitted to extend themselves along the left bank of the river without molestation. Buonaparte was accordingly left at liberty to fix on the field of battle, and he immediately determined to post the right wing of his army on the village of Essling, and the left on the neighbouring village of Aspern.—On the 21st, at day-break, the Archduke Charles formed his army in two lines on the rising ground behind Gerasdorf, near the Bisam Hill. Between the Austrian army and the Danube was an extensive plain, which, from the even and unobstructed nature of its surface, appeared destined to become the theatre of a general engagement. The Archduke Charles, having duly considered the advantageous position of the French army, and the difficulties he had to surmount, ordered the attack to be made in five columns, constituting a force of 75,000 effective men. Of artillery there were 18 batteries of brigade, 13 of position, and 11 of horse artillery; in the aggregate 280 pieces of ordnance of different calibres. The possession of Aspern was essentially necessary, to enable the Austrian artillery to play with effect upon the centre of the enemy's lines, and the army being put into motion exactly at twelve o'clock, the first and second columns were ordered to attack that village. The contest here was most obstinate and destructive: in every street, every house, and every out-building, the battle raged with unexampled fury; every wall was an impediment to the assailants, and a rampart for the attacked; the steeple, attics, and cellars, were to be conquered before either party could style himself master of the place; and, for seven hours, the conflict continued, each army rivalling the other in courage and perseverance. Scarcely had the Austrians succeeded in gaining possession of the village, when the French poured in strong reinforcements, and dislodged them at another; at length, the second column, combining its movements and attacks with those of the first, made itself master of the upper part of the village, and maintained its position during the whole of the first day's combat.—In the interim, the enemy, having formed his left wing towards Aspern, and his right towards Essling, advanced, in columns, upon the main body of the Austrian army, supported by a heavy cannonade. The cavalry, unable to withstand the impetuosity of this shock, fell back in disorder; but the infantry having reserved their fire till the French had advanced within ten paces, opened upon them with so much effect as to put them completely to the rout.—The Austrian line, thus disengaged from the enemy, obtained possession of the remainder of the village of Aspern, and maintained their ground in the face of all opposition. The third column endeavoured to take advantage of the rout of the enemy, by advancing against them in close battalion, supported by their artillery; but the French cavalry, commanded by Lassalle, suddenly rushed forward, in such numbers, and with so much rapidity, that the Austrian artillery narrowly escaped falling into their hands, and the battalions were left to defend themselves by their own unsupported exertions. The enemy's cavalry had succeeded in turning both the wings of this column, and in the confidence of victory had summoned them to lay down their arms. This degrading proposal was answered by a steady and well-directed fire, and the enemy was ultimately compelled to abandon his object, leaving the field covered with his slain. The fourth and fifth columns of the Austrian army were directed to drive the French out of the village of Essling, a position of as much importance to the right of the enemy, as Aspern was to his left. Here the French fought with still greater obstinacy and courage than they had displayed in the defence of Aspern; and, although the Austrians succeeded in driving back the corps which were posted in front of the enemy's position, all their efforts to dislodge them proved ineffectual, and at the close of this day's engagement, the village of Essling remained in possession of the French. The battle of the 21st was terminated only by the night: the French had been driven from Aspern, but they still retained possession of Essling. New efforts were to be expected the following day; Buonaparte's glory, as well as the existence of his army, was at stake; and the fate of the Austrian monarchy was suspended upon the success of the army under the Archduke. All the disposable troops in Vienna, under General Oudinot, were, during the night, transported across the Danube, in order to reinforce the French army; while the grenadier corps, which had not had any share in the first day's engagement, was ordered to advance from its position near Gerasdorf, to reinforce the Austrians.—During the battle of the 21st, the Archduke had ordered fire-ships to be sent down the river, and these vessels had been so well managed and directed, that the two bridges which connected the island of Lobau with the small island, and that island with the southern bank of the Danube, were destroyed. By the destruction of the bridges, Buonaparte was rendered less able to repair the disasters and losses he had sustained; and, in case the battle of the succeeding day should prove decisively adverse, his retreat, it was apprehended, would be completely cut off. At four o'clock in the morning of the 22d, the battle re-commenced, and the Duke of Rivoli again possessed himself of the village of Aspern. The regiments of Klebeck were now directed to make another effort to regain the village; but, after a desperate contest, carried on for upwards of an hour in the midst of conflagrations, the Austrians were at length obliged to give way. The regiment of Benyowsky now rushed in, and at the first onset gained possession of the church-yard, the walls of which were immediately destroyed, by order of General Hiller, and the church, and the parsonage-house, soon after shared the same fate. This regiment, supported by some battalions under General Bianchi, succeeded in establishing itself at the entrance of the village, and maintained this position against the repeated attacks of the flower of the French army. The Archduke Charles was now enabled to act on the offensive; the corps of the Austrian General Bellegarde, having its right wing resting on Aspern, and its centre and left towards Essling, by degrees, gained the right flank of the enemy; while the artillery, stationed near the former village in such a manner as to command the intervening space was brought to bear on his left flank: thus attacked and exposed, the French army was compelled to give way, and retire towards the Danube. While the division of Count Bellegarde was engaged at Aspern, the French cavalry, by a desperate effort, endeavoured to break in between the Austrian cavalry, commanded by Prince Lichtenstein, and the left wing of the Prince of Hohenzollern. Here the Archduke Charles particularly distinguished himself: the battalion of Zach seeming disposed to give way, he seized its colours, placed himself at its head, and inspired the whole army with the same enthusiasm with which he himself was animated.

In the midst of this attack by the French cavalry, the Prince of Hohenzollern perceived, on his left wing, near Essling, an opening in the French line, formed during the heat of the engagement: of this circumstance, he immediately took advantage, by ordering thither a regiment in three divisions, which succeeded in gaining and maintaining their position till the arrival of the grenadiers of reserve, by whose co-operation they were enabled to turn and attack the centre of the enemy. The only post which the French were now able to maintain was the village of Essling, which was attacked by Prince Rosenberg, and defended by the Duke of Montebello. The attack was made with redoubled bravery, and the Austrians pushed into the village with irresistible impetuosity; still, however, they found it impossible to maintain this post. Five times did these gallant troops rush up to the houses burning within, and placed in a state of defence; but all their efforts were fruitless, for their antagonists fought the fight of despair. In the night between the 22d and the morning of the 23d, French accomplished their retreat to Lobau: at three in the morning, their rear-guard evacuated Essling, and all the positions they had held on the left bank of the Danube. Thus terminated a conflict of two days, which will ever be memorable in the military annals of the world.*

In the short demi-official accounts published by the Austrians immediately after the battle of Aspern, it was triumphantly declared, that the ruin of Buonaparte was complete; but the event proved the fallacy of these expectations; and the state of inaction into which the army of the Archduke was suffered to fall after the 22d, too plainly indicated, that he had failed in his principal object, which was to drive back the enemy entirely over the first arms of the Danube, destroy the bridges he had thrown over them, and occupy the bank of the Lobau with a numerous artillery.

The King of Saxony having taken up arms against Austria, soon found himself stripped of a great part of his dominions, and forced to abandon his capital. The Austrians, possessing a powerful army in that quarter, threatened even the newly formed kingdom of Westphalia.†

Subsequently

* In this dreadful battle, the loss of the enemy was prodigious; it can only be accounted for by the effect of the concentric fire on an exceedingly confined field of battle, where 200 pieces of cannon crossed one another; and calculated by the following authentic data: the Duke of Montebello, Generals d'Espagne, St. Hilaire, and Albuquerque, were killed; Massena, Bessieres, Molitor, Boudet, Legrand, Lassalle, and the two brothers Legrange, were wounded; and Generals Durosnel and Fouler made prisoners. Upwards of 7000 men, and an immense number of horses, were buried on the field of battle; upwards of 5000 were conveyed to the Austrian hospitals; and in Vienna, and the suburbs, there were 29,773 wounded, exclusive of 2300 who were taken prisoners. The burying of the sufferers was continued for several days. The loss of the Austrians was also very great: their official accounts acknowledged the death of 87 superior officers, and of upwards of 4000 subalterns and private soldiers; and 12 of their Generals, 663 officers, and 15,600 subalterns and privates were wounded.

† A most formidable insurrection sprang up in Saxony, Westphalia, and Hanover, which if it had been cherished and directed by the support and skill either of the British or the Austrians, would have rendered the situation of Buonaparte dangerous and critical in the extreme. Unfortunately, however, no such aid was afforded; so that, after having harassed the French, and prevented the march of troops to the Danube, they were at last crushed by superior numbers and discipline. At the head of these partisans appeared two men, well calculated by their characters, talents, and influence, to collect and animate their followers. Schill, a Major in the Prussian service, animated by a strong detestation of Buonaparte, found no difficulty in raising the inhabitants of a conquered country; and, although it does not appear that the corps which this officer commanded, was, at any time, very numerous, it was formidable to the enemy by the rapidity of its movements, by its sudden and unexpected appearance, and by the countenance it afforded to the discontented inhabitants. After traversing the whole of the north of Germany, in different directions, and perplexing and defeating the troops that were opposed to him, Schill was at length compelled from the want of co-operation, and the pressure of superior numbers, to take shelter in Stralsund. Before he had recourse to this measure, he had made himself master of the whole of Mecklenburgh, where he had levied heavy contributions, and raised a great number of recruits. A strong body of Dutch troops, with a column of 1500 Danes, pursued him to Stralsund; in this place, although deprived of its fortifications, Schill had, with incredible industry, perseverance, and skill, made very formidable preparations to defend himself, and resist the attacks of his enemies; but, after an obstinate resistance, the town was forced; the insurgents were driven from their guns, and the enemy gained possession of streets, filled with the bodies of dead men, who merited a better fate. Schill, and 20 of his officers were killed; and such of his officers as were taken prisoners, were tried and executed as deserters from the King of Prussia. The Duke of Brunswick Oels, though in his own person less unfortunate than Schill, did not effect, by his army, any thing more decisively or permanently beneficial to the cause of Germany. The Duke did, indeed, for some time, distract the attention of the French, and occupy some of the troops destined to reinforce the army under Buonaparte: but he was at length compelled to seek for safety in flight, and succeeded in embarking with his little corps, for England.

In Italy, the operations and movements of the hostile armies were more important than those of the armies in Poland, or in the north of Germany. At the beginning of the campaign in Italy, the Austrians were eminently successful; they soon made themselves masters of Padua and Vicenza, crossed the Adige, and threatened Venice itself. But the victories of Buonaparte, in Bavaria, rendered it advisable for he Archduke John, who commanded the Austrian army in Italy, to measure

Subsequently to the battle of Aspern, till the end of the first week in July, Buonaparte continued stationary on the south bank of the Danube. That he was alarmed, both for his own situation, and from the effects which his repulse might have on the continent, was abundantly evident. Scarcely a day passed without producing a bulletin, the ostensible object of which was to register the rise and fall of the Danube, and to congratulate his army on the approach of the Russians, and the junction of the troops under the Viceroy of Italy. Buonaparte, however, was making the most formidable preparations, not merely to protect himself against an attack from the Archduke Charles, but to enable him to resume offensive operations with success. The construction of the bridges over the Danube was intrusted to General Count Bertrand. In a fortnight, this engineer raised a bridge of 60 arches to In-der-Lobau, so broad that three carriages could pass abreast, over 400 fathoms of a rapid river. A second bridge, eight feet broad, was constructed for infantry. These bridges were secured against the effects of fire-ships, by stoccadoes, raised on piles, between the islands in different directions, and an armed flotilla cruised upon the river to defend these various and copious sources of communication. Each of the bridges was covered and protected by a tete-du-pont, 160 fathoms long, surrounded by palisades, frizes, and ditches filled with water; and magazines of provisions, 100 pieces of cannon, and 20 mortars, were stationed on the island. Opposite Essling, on the left arm of the Danube, another bridge was formed by the Duke of Rivoli, guarded, in like manner, by a tete-du-pont. At this time, the Austrian army was strongly intrenched on the north bank of the Danube; the left wing stretching towards Enzersdorf, and the right resting on the village of Aspern, which was surrounded with field fortifications, for the purpose of opposing the passage of the river.—Whilst Buonaparte was thus engaged in fortifying his positions, and in preparing such stupendous means for crossing the Danube, the Archduke Charles had not only raised works, and planted cannon to secure himself against an attack, but he had also drawn from Germany, Poland, and Hungary, immense reinforcements. It is not easy to calculate exactly the number of troops in either army; but, at a fair estimation, they may be taken at 150,000 men each. As the principal means of passing the Danube had been formed directly opposite to the Austrian redoubts, between Aspern and Essling, the attention of the Archduke Charles was in a great measure, confined to this point. The object of Buonaparte, however, was to divert the attention of the Archduke, and not to cross the river in the face of the enemy's most formidable position.

On the 4th of July, at ten o'clock at night, General Oudinot, with 1500 voltigeurs, embarked in ten gun-boats, on the great arm of the Danube, and crossed the river opposite Muhllieten. During the night, four new bridges were completed; one of them, in a single piece, 80 toises long, was fixed in less than five minutes, and the three others consisted of boats and rafts thrown over the river. The night was unusually dark, the rain fell in torrents, and the violence of the storm favoured the operations of the enemy. At two o'clock in the morning of the 5th, the whole French army had crossed the Danube, the corps of the Duke of Rivoli forming the left; that of Count Oudinot the centre; and that of the Duke of Auerstadt the right. At day-break, they were arranged in order of battle, at the extremity of the left flank of the Austrians. The Archduke Charles was thus completely out-generaled; his works were rendered useless, and he was compelled to abandon his positions, and to fight the enemy on the spot chosen by themselves. At five o'clock, three bodies of the French cavalry, and as many of infantry, with an immense quantity of ordnance, were seen defiling near Wittau. At six o'clock, the enemy had surrounded and taken all the Austrian fortifications between Essling and Enzersdorf, the garrisons of which were almost all either killed or wounded. The whole of the 5th was spent in manœuvring, and during the night Buonaparte attempted to gain possession of the village of Wagram; but, owing to the gallant resistance of the Austrians, and to a column of Saxons, and a column of French mistaking each other in the dark, the operation failed. A general engagement had now become inevitable, and at the dawn of the morning of the 6th, the two armies, each provided with upwards of 500 pieces of cannon, were drawn out for battle.—The arrangements of the two hostile commanders were directly at variance with each other. Buonaparte had passed the night in accumulating a force to strengthen his centre, where he placed himself in person within cannon-shot of Wagram. The Archduke Charles had, on the contrary, extended his flanks, and weakened his centre. The corps of Prince Rosenberg, and that of the Duke of Auerstadt, moving in opposite directions, encountered each other in the morning, and gave the signal of battle. At this time, the Austrians were preparing to make a storming attack upon Ober Sieben-brunn, when the Archduke Charles, perceiving that the right wing had not arrived, ordered the Prince to halt, and he was ultimately obliged to retire under a galling fire, to his former position. This inauspicious commencement of the battle was succeeded by a vigorous attempt on the centre of the French lines at Raschdorf, where Buonaparte, surrounded by 60,000 men in close order, stood directing the operations of his army. The attempt to penetrate the French lines proving unsuccessful, two columns of infantry, protected by a body of cavalry, advanced towards Aderklaa: here the quantity of grape-shot poured in upon the Austrians, became overwhelming, and a momentary panic seized the battalions under Marshal Beflegarde; but, at length, the heroism and energy of the field officers, succeeded in restoring order, and the enemy was driven, at the point of the bayonet, towards Aderklaa.—The cannonade now became general along the whole line, and the effect of the injudicious dispositions of the Austrian General, in weakening his centre, every moment manifested itself. Buonaparte, surprised at this manœuvre, at first suspected some stratagem, but he was soon convinced that the Archduke Charles had committed a fatal error, of which he hastened to take advantage. With this view, the Duke of Rivoli was ordered to attack the Austrians at the extremity of the centre, while the Duke of Auerstadt was directed first to turn the position of Mark Grafen Neusiedel, and then to push upon Wagram. The attack upon Mark Grafen, was vigorous in the extreme; and Prince Rosenberg was, after a desperate resistance, obliged to evacuate that village. The success of the enemy in out-flanking the Austrians, continued to increase; and five battalions and one regiment of cavalry, sent by Prince Hohenzollern, were found incapable of arresting his operations. The tower of Neusiedel, built in ancient times, to check the incursions of the Hungarians, formed the key of this position, and was defended by Prince Rosenberg, with great gallantry and perseverance; but a concentric discharge of grape-shot mowed down his ranks with so much rapidity, that he measure back his steps. To this determination he was also probably in some degree led, by the reinforcement of 10,000 men, which the Viceroy of Italy, Prince Eugene, received from Tuscany. Thus reinforced, the French army of Italy retook Padua and Vicenza, and attacked and overthrew the Austrians beyond the Piave, with the loss of 16 pieces of cannon, and 4000 prisoners. A few days after this engagement, the French crossed the Tagliamento, and after a few partial skirmishes, inflicted another defeat upon the Austrian army at Tarvis. Advancing towards Vienna, in their victorious career, the French were enabled on the anniversary of the battle of Marengo, to bring the Archduke John to another engagement at Raab. Victory was, for a long time, doubtful, but that part of the Archduke's army, which consisted of the raw and undisciplined troops of the Hungarian insurrection, at length gave way, and 6 pieces of cannon, 4 standards, and 3000 prisoners, fell into the hands of the French. After this engagement, the Archduke John retreated with considerable rapidity, and in some disorder, towards Pest, for the purpose of forming a junction with the main Austrian army. After the battle of Raab, the Viceroy of Italy advanced without impediment to the Austrian capital; and, by the addition of the force under his command, served to swell the number of combatants in the approaching great and decisive battle of Wagram.

was at length obliged to give way, and to leave the French General in possession of the eminence. At the same moment that the attack upon Mark Grafen was taking place, a furious effort was directed against the Austrian centre. Buonaparte, acting upon the principle of all his former campaigns, ordered the centre of his army to form in two columns, supported by two batteries, consisting of 160 pieces of artillery.—As soon as these columns were formed, General Macdonald advanced at their head at the pas de charge: General Reille, with the brigade of fusileers and sharpshooters, supported by Macdonald; and to render the attack irresistible, the guards, at the same time, made an advance in front. The Austrian centre, incapable of withstanding this tremendous onset, fell back a league. The right, perceiving the dangerous position in which it was now placed, retreated along with the centre; and the left being out-flanked by the Duke of Auerstadt, fell back upon Wagram.

At ten o'clock in the morning, it was clear, to a military eye, that the fate of the day was decided, and from that moment the Austrians fought only to secure their retreat. At noon, the important position of Wagram was carried; and the Archduke Charles, finding himself cut off from Hungary and Moravia, fell back upon Bohemia. At four o'clock in the afternoon, the Archduke John, at the head of his corps, arrived on the field of battle from Presburg, but the battle was then decided, and in the evening he retreated in the same direction in which he had advanced. This battle, fought in the vicinity of the Austrian capital, by 300,000 men, in the view of an equal number of spectators, decided the fate of Germany. The number of the slain was immense; and 10 stand of colours, 40 pieces of cannon, and 20,000 prisoners, according to the French bulletins, formed the trophies of the victory. The French, in estimating the loss of the Austrians, stated that the battle of Wagram had deprived them of 60,000 soldiers; and the Austrians, in their official returns, admit a loss, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, of upwards of 30,000 men. The loss of the French, was considerable: in their own bulletins, it was stated at 1500 killed, and 4000 wounded; but the Austrian accounts swell the number to 20,000. One of the disastrous consequences of this sanguinary day, was the destruction of twelve of the most considerable villages in the beautiful plain of Vienna. The French, who lost no time in pursuing the Austrians, came up with the retreating army, on the 10th of July, at Znaim, where another battle was fought, which was terminated by a proposal from the Emperor Francis to conclude an armistice.

On the 12th, an armistice was signed, and the terms of this document too plainly indicated the extent of the Austrian losses, and the exhausted state of their resources.* While Buonaparte was at Vienna, and within a few days of the great battle of Aspern, he caused proclamations to be made in the public squares and market-place of that city, that from the 1st of June the Papal territory should be united with the French empire; and that Rome should, at the same time, be declared a free and imperial city.† The Pope solemnly protested against the violence and injustice by which he had been stripped of his temporal sovereignty; and, at the same time, issued an act of excommunication against the French Emperor, and all his co-operators, in this act of unprovoked spoliation. The thunders of the Vatican, however, had lost their terrors; and an act, which three centuries ago would have roused to arms, all the states of Europe, was now witnessed without one single effort, on the part of the surrounding sovereigns, to pluck the prey from the hands of the universal tyrant.

It had frequently been indirectly intimated, that Buonaparte meant to divorce Josephine, for the purpose of uniting himself with a younger and more noble bride. On the 16th of December, this design was formally announced to the Conservative Senate; and, on the same day, the project of a decree was submitted to that assembly, and before the sitting terminated, the law, authorising the divorce, was enacted. To witness these proceedings, most of the relations of the Emperor and Empress, were summoned to Paris. The Arch-Chancellor was ordered to attend in the grand cabinet of Napoleon, where Josephine, the upstart Kings of Holland, Westphalia, and Naples; the Viceroy of Italy; the Queens of Holland, Westphalia, and Spain; Madame, the mother of Buonaparte; and his sister Pauline, were assembled. Buonaparte explained to the assembly his views, and the motives by which he was actuated; and Josephine declared, that she willingly consented to the divorce, to further the policy of her husband, and the interests of the state. A proces verbal was then drawn up, to which was annexed a decree, pronouncing the marriage contract between Buonaparte and Josephine to be dissolved.

At the commencement of the contest with Russia, the Swedes had displayed traits of heroism that would have reflected honour on the army of Charles XII.; but, notwithstanding the liberal subsidy granted by Britain, neither the population, nor the finances of Sweden, were equal to the exigency of her present situation. The progress of the Russians in Finland, and the increasing calamities of the war, aggravated by the ravages of a contagious distemper, and the knowledge of the army, that it was the fixed purpose of the King again to measure his strength against the empires of Russia and France, excited universal discontent; and a confederacy was formed against the noble-minded Gustavus, whose conduct had lately appeared tinctured with insanity, which terminated in his expulsion from the throne of his ancestors. This bloodless

* From causes which, at the time, were not understood, but which in subsequent matrimonial alliance tended in some degree to explain, the negociations for a definitive treaty of peace between France and Austria, proceeded very slowly, and were not finally closed till the month of October. When the terms of peace were made known, they were generally regarded as by no means unfavourable to Austria. The cessions made by the Emperor Francis were, however, very considerable, and may be comprised under three heads: 1st, those to the sovereigns forming the Rhenish league, generally; 2d, those to the French Emperor; and 3d, those to the King of Saxony. To the King of Bavaria, were ceded Salzburg, and a portion of territory extending along the banks of the Danube, from Passau to the vicinity of Lintz. To France, Austria gave up Fiume and Trieste, with the whole of the country to the south of the Saave, till that river enters Bosnia. The King of Saxony obtained several villages in Bohemia; and, in Poland, the whole of Western Galicia, from the frontiers of Silesia to the Bog, together with the city of Cracow, and a district round it in Eastern Galicia. Russia obtained so much of this latter province, as should contain 400,000 souls. With respect to external politics, the Emperor Francis agreed to acknowledge Joseph Buonaparte King of Spain; to accede to the continental system; and to break off all intercourse with Great Britain. The most mortifying and humiliating condition of this treaty, however, was that by which the Austrian monarch gave up the inhabitants of the Tyrol to Bavaria, with a provision, indeed, that Buonaparte should procure for them a complete and full pardon. In every part of Germany peace was now established, except in the Tyrol: the inhabitants of this country, though deserted and given up by that government in whose favour they had risen in arms, and to whom they had manifested an attachment, unbroken by the most dreadful sacrifices and sufferings, still refused submission to the conquerors. Their resistance was most formidable; some of the most experienced Generals of Buonaparte, at the head of his best troops, were repeatedly defeated, and driven back, with great loss, even after they had penetrated into the centre of the Tyrol. At the head of the mountaineers, appeared a man worthy of being a leader among a nation of heroes. The brave Hoffer animated and directed the actions of his countrymen; and, before him, untutored as he was, in the art of war, the experienced troops of Europe fled in dismay. In vain did Buonaparte pour in fresh forces, block up the passes of the mountains, and forbid all communication between the inhabitants and the neighbouring countries. All his schemes were foiled; and if, for a short time, the Tyrolese fled before his armies, or appeared not to oppose their progress, it was only to attack them to more advantage in the passes of the mountains, or to fall upon them when they were unprepared. On the conquest of the country, however, Buonaparte was determined, and at length he effected his purpose, by pouring in continued reinforcements, and by the capture and infamous execution of the gallant Hoffer.

† This decree, which fixed the annual revenue of the Pope at 2,000,000 of francs, was grounded on three propositions; first, that the territories of Rome, were fiefs bestowed by the Emperor Charlemagne, the predecessor of Buonaparte, on the Bishops of Rome, to maintain the peace of his subjects; secondly, that ever since that time, the union of temporal and spiritual power has been, and still is, the source of dissension; and, thirdly, that the temporal pretensions of the Pope are irreconcileable with the security of the French army, the repose and prosperity of the nations subject to the sway of Napoleon, and the dignity and inviolability of his empire.

revolution, which took place on the 13th of March, 1809, was effected without commotion; and, the diet being assembled at Stockholm, the Duke of Sudermania, uncle to the King, was declared Regent, and was afterwards chosen King, to the exclusion of his nephew. Charles XIII. on ascending the throne of Sweden, professed his determination not to consent to any peace with Russia, that should be disgraceful to his country, or that should oblige her to take up arms against her faithful ally, Great Britain. The war between Russia and Sweden was accordingly renewed: but misfortune still attended the Swedish armies, and peace was at length purchased by the sacrifice of Finland. Soon after the conclusion of the treaty of peace with Russia, negociations were opened between Sweden and France, and on the 6th of January, 1810, a treaty was concluded, by which Swedish Pomerania, with the principality of Rugen, was restored to Sweden; the former commercial relations between the two countries were revived; and Buonaparte prevailed upon his new ally to adopt the continental system, and to exclude British commerce from the ports of the Baltic.

On the 19th of January, Parliament assembled, when his Majesty's speech was delivered by commission. This document, which related principally to the peninsula of Spain and Portugal, strongly recommended an augmentation of the regular army, in order that his Majesty might be the better enabled, without impairing the means of defence at home, to avail himself of the military power of his dominions to conduct the great contest in which he was engaged to a conclusion compatible with the honour of his Majesty's crown, and with the interests of his allies, of Europe, and of the world. The usual address was carried in both houses without a division; but not without several strong and pointed animadversions on the manner in which the war had been conducted, and on the general policy of his Majesty's government.—On the 25th of January, the Earl of Liverpool, in the House of Peers, and Lord Castlereagh, in the House of Commons, moved the thanks of Parliament, to the officers and men under Sir John Moore, by whose gallantry and good conduct, the victory of Corunna was achieved. The motion was carried, unanimously, in both Houses; and a monument was voted to the memory of the deceased General. This was succeeded by a motion for thanks to Sir Arthur Wellesley, and the officers and men under his command, for the brilliant victory obtained at the battle of Vimiera; which was carried, with the sole dissentient voice of Lord Folkstone, who thought such a tribute greater than the service could claim.

On the 2d of February, a bill was introduced into the House of Commons, by Lord Castlereagh, for augmenting the disposable force of the country;* and, though it called forth a very animated opposition, the measure ultimately passed into a law.

The convention of Cintra, and the circumstances which led to the conclusion of that treaty, were, on the 21st of February, brought under the consideration of Parliament, by Lord Henry Petty, who moved, "that the convention concluded at Cintra, on the 30th of August, 1808, and the maritime convention concluded off the Tagus, on the 3d of September, in the same year, appear to this House to have disappointed the hopes and expectations of the country; and, that the causes and circumstances which immediately led to the conclusion of those conventions, appear to this House, in a great measure, to have arisen from the misconduct and neglect of his Majesty's ministers."—This motion was strenuously opposed by ministers, who contended, that it was a brilliant addition to the military glory of the country, to have expelled, in the course of a short campaign of three weeks, an army of 25,000 French from Portugal; and, on the motion of Lord Castlereagh, the previous question was put, and carried by 203 against 152. This motion was succeeded by another, three days afterwards, by Mr. Ponsonby, for the institution of an inquiry into the causes, consequences, and events, of the late disasters in Spain. This inquiry, ministers judged it proper to resist; and a considerable majority of the House was in their favour.

Previously, however, to the latter motions, Colonel Wardle rose, (January 27,) in the House of Commons, to submit a motion respecting certain abuses which had prevailed in the British army. In bringing forward this subject, he was impelled, he said, by no other motive than a sense of public duty, and he should make no assertions that were not supported by positive facts. The power of disposing of commissions in the military service of the empire, had been placed in the hands of a person of high birth, and extensive influence; and he was sorry to say, that this power had been exercised to the worst of purposes. The disposal of commissions in the army had been placed in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief for the purpose of defraying the charges of the half-pay list, for the support of veteran officers, and for increasing the compassionate fund for the aid of officers' widows and orphans; but he could bring positive proof that such commissions had been sold, and the money applied to very different purposes; and this duty, so essential to the rights of the army, and the interests of his country, he should discharge without dismay. For this purpose, it was absolutely necessary to call the attention of the House to an establishment of the Commander-in-Chief, in Gloucester Place; this establishment, which consisted of a splendid house, a variety of carriages, and a long retinue of servants, commenced in the year 1803, and at the head of it was placed a Lady of the name of Clarke. Of that Lady's name he should have occasion to make frequent mention, in connection with a number of names and facts, to shew the House that he had not taken up this subject on light grounds.†

Having

* His Lordship observed, that it had been ascertained, that in every extraordinary crisis, a considerable supply of troops could be had for the regular army by availing ourselves of the zeal and spirit which were always manifested on such occasions, by the militia, who were ever willing to volunteer their services when there was a great and presssing necessity for increasing the disposable force; and out of 28,000 men permitted, on a late occasion, to volunteer from the militia into the line, 27,000 did actually enter within the space of twelve months. The extent to which he proposed to limit the volunteering into the line, would be, that no regiment of militia should be reduced to less than three-fifths of its present force; and, instead of 36,000 men, to be raised in England, to supply the deficiency, he should now propose only 24,000. To relieve the counties from the great pressure of the ballot, he should propose, that the expense of raising the men to fill up the vacancies in the militia, should be defrayed, not by the counties, but the public. The bounty to recruits he should fix at ten guineas; and if the voluntary inlistment for the militia, did not succeed, and a ballot was found necessary, it was his intention, to propose, that the bounty of ten guineas should be given to the ballotted man to assist him in procuring a substitute. It was stated, by the Earl of Liverpool, that the regular army then consisted of upwards of 210,000 infantry, and 27,000 cavalry. The infantry was disposed into 126 first battalions, averaging 900 men each, and 56 second battalions, of which the average number was about 400 men, and the object of this bill was to render the second battalions complete.

† The first case, he observed, was that of Captain Tonyn: this officer, who held his Captaincy in the 48th regiment of foot, received his commission as a Captain, on the 2d of August, 1802, and was promoted to a Majority in the 31st regiment, in August, 1804. He was indebted for his promotion to the influence of Mrs. Clarke. Captain Tonyn was introduced to that Lady, by Captain Huxley Sandon, of the royal waggon train; the terms of agreement were, that Mrs. Clarke should be paid 500 pounds, upon his Majority being gazetted, and this sum was, in the mean time, lodged in the hands of Mr. Jeremiah Donovan, a surgeon, of Charles Street, St. James's Square. This Mr. Donovan was appointed a Lieutenant in the 4th royal garrison battalion, in 1802, and was afterwards promoted to the 11th battalion, but since the day of his appointment he had never joined his regiment, and seemed to have leave of perpetual absence. Major Tonyn was gazetted, and the money which had been lodged in Mr. Donovan's hands, was then paid to Mrs. Clarke, by Captain Huxley Sandon. The regulated difference between a Company and a Majority, was 1100*l.*; but, in this instance, Mrs. Clarke gained 500*l.* and the 1100*l.* was lost to the half-pay fund. This sum of 500*l.* was paid by Mrs. Clarke to Mr. Birkett, a silversmith, in part payment for a service of plate for the establishment in Gloucester Place, the balance for which plate was afterwards paid by the Duke of York. "From this case," said Colonel Wardle, "it is clearly deducible, that Mrs. Clarke possessed the power of military promotion; that she received pecuniary consideration for such promotion; and that the Commander-in-Chief was a partaker in the benefit arising from such pecuniary consideration. The second case was an exchange concluded on Having gone through the whole of his stament, Colonel Wardle concluded by moving for a committee of inquiry into the conduct of the Duke of York, in respect to the disposal of military commissions. This motion was seconded by Sir Francis Burdett.* After a debate of considerable length, the motion was agreed to; the Chancellor of the Exchequer observing, that publicity had been mentioned as desirable; he was of the same opinion; and it was therefore determined that the investigation should be conducted before a committee of the whole House.† In the course of the cross examinations, much important evidence was adduced; and one of the most conclusive proofs of the truth of the charges, arose from the fact, that they derived additional strength from the means taken by the advocates of the Commander-in-Chief to refute them: indeed his Royal Highness was more indebted for the strong parts of the case made out against him to his friends than to his enemies; and the numerous letters brought to light by their means, of which the prosecutor at first was totally ignorant, placed Mr. Wardle, for a time, on high ground. At the close of the evidence on the 22d of February, the opinion of the general officers, who were members of the House of Commons, was asked with respect to the improvement of the army in discipline and condition, and whether the system of promotion had not been the 25th of July, 1805, through the influence of Mrs. Clarke, between Lieutenant-Colonel Brook, of the 56th regiment of infantry, and Lieutenant-Colonel Knight, of the 5th dragoon guards. It was agreed that Mr. Clarke should receive 200*l.* on this exchange being gazetted, and as the lady wanted some money to defray the expences of an excursion into the country, she urged the Commander-in-Chief to expedite this exchange; her request was made on Thursday; the exchange was gazetted upon the Saturday following, and Mrs. Clarke received in consequence the 200*l.* from Dr. Thynne, a physician, who negociated the transaction. Here then was a case which proved that exchanges, as well as promotions, were at the disposal of Mrs. Clarke, and that the purse of the Commander-in-chief was saved by the supply which his mistress derived from such sources. The next was the case of Major Shaw, appointed deputy barrack-master-general at the Cape of Good Hope. It appeared that the Commander-in-Chief had no favourable opinion of Major Shaw; but Mr. Clarke interposes; he consents to pay her 1,000*l.* Of this money he immediately paid 200*l.* shortly after he paid her 300*l.* more; when she, finding he was backward in the payment, sent to demand the remainder; but seeing no chance of receiving it, she complains to the Commander-in-Chief, who immediately put Major Shaw upon the half-pay list. The honourable gentleman said, he had a letter from Major Shaw himself stating the fact, and he never knew but one other instance of an officer being thus put upon the half-pay list. Here then was a further proof, to show that Mrs. Clarke's influence extended to the army in general, and that it operated to put any officer on the half-pay list, and that the Commander-in-chief was a direct party in her authority. The next case to which he should advert, of the lady's influence, was that of Colonel French, of the horse guards. This gentleman was appointed to a commission for raising new levies in 1804, and the business was set on foot by Mrs. Clarke. He was introduced to her by Captain Huxley Sandon, and she was to have a certain sum out of the bounty for every recruit raised, and a certain portion of patronage in the nomination of the officers. She was waited on by Colonel French, of the first troop of horse guards, and as the levy went on, she received various sums of money by Colonel French, Captain Huxley Sandon, Mr. Cerri, and Mr. Cokayne, an eminent solicitor in London. To so great a height had the practice of selling commissions in this disreputable manner arisen, that a written scale of Mrs. Clarke's prices, as contrasted with the regulated price of commissions, was sent by Mr. Donovan to Captain Tuck, to whom he very strongly recommended this path to promotion, as follows:—

	Mrs. Clarke's Prices.	Regulated Prices.
A Majority,	*L.*900	*L.*2,600
A Company,	700	1,200
A Lieutenancy,	400	550
An Ensigncy,	200	400

From this scale it appeared that all this was lost to the half-pay compassionate fund, to put money into Mrs. Clarke's pocket. The next instance was one in which the Commander-in-Chief himself was a direct partaker in the advantages of this traffic, by a loan to be furnished through Colonel French, the writings for which were drawn by a Mr. Grant, an eminent solicitor of Barnard's Inn, for the purpose of raising 3,000*l*; but he did not receive it, because a sum of 3,000*l.* was due from government to Colonel French. It was obvious that Mrs Clarke exercised an influence in raising the military force of the country, in disposing of commands in that force, and in converting the purchase of commissions to her own private advantage. The honourable gentleman next alluded to the case of Captain May, of the African corps, who had obtained promotion in the army over the heads of all the subalterns, though he had never joined his regiment; and was in fact still a clerk in the office of Mr. Greenwood, the army agent. There was another circumstance in this case which he could not pass unnoticed; it was the existence of a public office in the city of London, where commissions in the army were offered to purchasers at reduced prices, and where the clerks openly and unequivocally stated, in his own presence, and in his hearing, that they were employed by the present favourite mistress of the Commander-in-Chief, Mrs. Carey; and that, in addition to commissions in the army, they were employed to dispose of places in every department of church and state; and those agents did not hesitate to state, in words and writing, that they were employed under the auspices of two of his Majesty's principal ministers.

* Perhaps few subjects were ever before listened to with such deep attention in the House of Commons, as the speech delivered by Colonel Wardle on this occasion; and few subjects have ever taken such firm hold on the public mind. Confidently, however, as the charges were made, they were met with equal confidence by the friends of the royal Duke. On the ministerial side of the House, it was said, that so far from shrinking from inquiry, the Commander-in-Chief was anxious for a full investigation of the business now submitted to the consideration of Parliament. The matter had now assumed a tangible shape, and it behoved the honourable gentleman to establish the very serious and important charges which he had thought it his duty to exhibit. Every loyal subject had, for some time past, viewed with the deepest concern, the continued and rapid current of anonymous scurrility which had been poured forth against the various branches of the royal family; and it was perfectly clear, observed Mr. Yorke, that a vile jacobinical conspiracy existed against the illustrious house of Brunswick. If in bringing forward these charges, the honourable gentleman was actuated solely by patriotic motives, and a regard to the public welfare, his conduct was entitled to the highest admiration; but it was not to be disguised, that when such imputations were once exhibited, they must be brought to a conclusion, and ignominy and infamy must attach somewhere. The members in the opposition concurred fully in this inquiry. It was expedient that the rumours in circulation to the disadvantage of the Duke of York, should be fairly brought to the test of investigation, before so grave, so honourable, and so competent a tribunal as the House of Commons, and there receive the judgment and decision, which, no doubt, would be highly honourable to the character of the illustrious personage, who had been so vehemently assailed by them. As to the anonymous libels complained of, they had nothing to do with this inquiry; the charges now made were not anonymous, and the Duke of York ought to be obliged to the honourable gentleman who had brought them forward, and given him an opportunity of rendering his character impervious to future attacks. Not only the eyes of the country, but the attention of all Europe, would be fixed upon the pending investigation, and it behoved the House to act in the most grave and decisive manner.

† The charges against the Duke of York, divested of their technicality, resolve themselves into this one point—that, availing himself of his high office, he had knowingly permitted the woman whom he kept as his mistress, to traffic in commissions in the army, and did himself participate in the emoluments which were derived from this scandalous, corrupt, and illegal traffic. The evidence on which Colonel Wardle supported this momentous charge, arose from the testimony of Mrs. Clarke, the principal agent in these transactions, filled up where it was defective, and corroborated where it was weak, by the testimony of those to whom she had disposed of commissions, or by documents brought forward in the progress of the inquiry. That Mrs. Clarke had received large sums of money from a great number of persons for the exertion of her influence, real or supposed, with the Duke of York, while she was living under his "protection" in Gloucester-Place, was aproved by the evidence of Dr. Thynne, Mr. Robert Knight, Captain Huxley Sandon, Mr. Dowler, and others, who had themselves purchased her services, and who, for the most part, appeared as unwilling witnesses: but that the Duke was cognisant to these corrupt practices, and that the money so raised was, with his knowledge, applied to defray the expenses of the establishment of his mistress, was not made equally clear. There was, however, strong ground of suspicion, and the prevailing opinion was, that this charge also was satisfactorily established by the evidence of Mrs. Clarke, Miss Taylor, her relation, Mr. Dowler, of the commissariat department, and the documents elicited in the progress of the investigation. The history of the origin of this nefarious traffic was thus given by Mrs. Clarke. The establishment in Gloucester Place, consisted of two carriages, six or eight horses, and eight or ten men servants, of all of which she had to pay the expense. Her allowance from the Duke of York was 1,000*l.* a year; but for three months before his Royal Highness left her, he never gave her a guinea, and so far were the sums which she received from him from defraying the expenses of the establishment, that they would scarcely pay the servants their wages, and buy them liveries. This she often represented to his Royal Highness, and after they had been acquainted a few months, he told her, that if she was clever, she would never ask him for money; he added, that she had more interest than the Queen, and that she might use it. Of these hints she did not fail to profit; and the Duke was well aware that she used her influence with him in order to procure money from military officers and others, and that the money so obtained was applied to defray the expenses incident to her situation. The statement that the Duke had allowed only 1,000*l.* a year for the support of the prodigal and profligate establishment in Gloucester-Place, made so strong an impression on the public, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was driven to the necessity of contradicting this assertion, by declaring, that the sum expended by the Duke of York upon this seat of voluptuousness, from January, 1804, to May, 1806, amounted to 16,760*l.*; but this assertion, though it exposed the extravagance of the Duke, did not invalidate the evidence of his discarded mistress; for when the purchase of the lease of the premises, the expense of furniture, and the presents of plate and jewels, were taken into the account, not more than a balance of 1,000*l.* a year remained to meet the current domestic expenditure.

improved

improved under the administration of the Duke of York. Generals Norton and Fitzpatric, the Secretary of war, Sir Arthur Wellesley, and General Grosvenor, all answered these questions affirmatively, and pronounced high eulogiums on the character and conduct of his Royal Highness. During this inquiry, which was continued for three weeks without the intervention of any other business, Mrs. Clarke was repeatedly examined at the bar; and by the readiness and smartness of her answers to the infinite number of questions proposed, gave a degree of relief to the protracted examinations.* On the 23d of February a letter was addressed by the Duke of York, to the House of Commons, through the medium of the Speaker, in which his Royal Highness, in the most solemn manner, upon his honour as a prince, distinctly asserted his innocence, and claimed from the justice of the House, that he should not be condemned without a trial.

On the 8th of March the subject was resumed, when Mr. Wardle moved an address to his Majesty, stating, that, after a diligent and laborious inquiry, it had been proved, to the satisfaction of the House, that corrupt practices had existed to a very great extent in the different departments of the military administration: and praying that his Majesty would be graciously pleased to remove the Duke of York from the command of the army. To that address an amendment was proposed, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, substituting two resolutions, the first, stating that an inquiry had been instituted into the conduct of the Commander-in-Chief; and the second, that it was the opinion of the House that there was no just ground to charge his Royal Highness with personal corruption or criminal connivance. To this amendment another amendment was afterwards moved by Mr. Bankes, acquitting the Duke of York of personal corruption or criminal connivance, but expressive of an opinion that abuses could scarcely have existed to the extent to which they had been proved, without exciting some suspicion in the mind of the Commander-in-Chief, and suggesting that, after the exposures made by the recent inquiry, the causes of religion, and a regard to the public happiness and tranquillity, required the removal of the Duke of York from the command of the army. The motion of Mr. Wardle, and the subsequent amendments, gave rise to many long and animated discussions, which continued for several nights; and in the course of these debates, it was urged, in favour of the original motion, that whatever might be due to the superior rank of his Royal Highness, the members of that House should, as representatives of the people, always bear in mind that it was their duty to protect the public interests, and to watch over the security and welfare of the state. By the supporters of the Duke of York, it was contended, that Mrs. Clarke was wholly unworthy of credit, and that there was no evidence to establish the corrupt participation or criminal connivance of the Duke. Was it to be supposed that an illustrious Prince, of such high rank, would associate himself with such miscreants as the witnesses in this investigation? If he had entered into so foul a plot, he would have found different agents; he would not have surrounded himself with men of honour and the avowed enemies of army-brokers, but he would have found some supple, bending, complying agent, for his military secretary. If it could once be supposed that the Duke was a party in such a conspiracy, how was it possible that there should have been any distress for money, when there was a mint for making it constantly at work? There were then in the army upwards of 10,000 officers; and such was the eagerness for promotion, that there were always persons ready to give ample premiums above the regulated price. Had not his Royal Highness felt secure in conscious innocence, was it to be supposed that he would have ventured to discard Mrs. Clarke, to withdraw her annuity, to irritate her to the utmost, and to set all her threats at defiance? If the Duke of York had not entertained a high sense of the value of honour and character, he would not have parted from Mrs. Clarke, when he found her character would not stand the test of investigation. It ought to be recollected, that the person against whom the charge now under the consideration of the House was directed, was not only high in office and in rank, but one whose birth placed him so near the crown, that events might one day call him to the throne itself; and yet, by the proceeding now proposed, the House was called upon, on the most questionable evidence, to disgrace itself, by pronouncing the Duke guilty of the lowest and most infamous species of corruption. In favour of Mr. Bankes's amendment, it was urged, that the case of Dr. O'Meara, which rested upon the Duke of York's own letter as much as upon the evidence of Mrs. Clarke, shewed that the Duke held communication with his mistress on public concerns. It was astonishing that the constant applications of this woman did not create some doubts and suspicions in the mind of the Duke. The House was not only the guardian of the public purse but of the public morals. It was impossible, after the evidence that had been given, to entertain any doubt that a public scandal had been brought upon the country by the conduct of his Royal Highness; and it was necessary, as a reparation to public morals and decency, to remove him from the command of the army. Suppose the case to be according to the mildest interpretation of his friends, that the Duke had no knowledge or suspicion of the transactions, but that he was completely deceived and blinded by the woman whom he passionately loved, that would be a sufficient reason for calling for his removal from the command of the army; the more innocent and unsuspecting he was described to be, the more danger there was that the enemy might find out his foible, and use it to the disadvantage, and even to the ruin of the country. The first division on the question, whether the House should proceed by address or resolution, decided the fate of Mr. Bankes's amendment, and there appeared for proceeding by address 199; for proceeding by resolution, 291; leaving a majority against Mr. Bankes's address of 95. A second division then took place on Mr. Wardle's motion, which was supported by 153, and opposed by 364.

* On one occasion, being asked by Mr. Croker, if she had not written an anonymous letter to the Prince of Wales? she answered, Yes. Did you sign any name to this anonymous letter, said Mr. Croker? Mrs. Clarke made no reply, but, looking archly at the chairman, burst into a fit of laughter, in which, indeed, she was joined by the whole House. Being asked by Sir Vicary Gibbs, if she had given the same account to Mr. Wardle of the negociation for the exchange between Colonels Brook and Knight, that she now gave to the House of Commons? she replied, No. Which then is the true account? Both. In what then, inquired Sir Vicary, did they differ? They did not differ at all, replied Mrs. Clarke—she had not entered into the same detail with Colonel Wardle. The Attorney-General, in order to weaken her evidence, by bringing her motives and general character into discredit, enquired if she had not said, that if the Duke of York did not come into her terms, she would expose him? No; if the Duke did not pay her the annuity of 400*l.* which he had promised, she would publish his letters, and pay her creditors with the profits of the publication. Had she not sworn that she was not a married woman, when she was examined before a court-martial? No; she thought it would be improper to say that she was a married woman, when it was known she had been living with the Duke of York, and she said she was not, but did not swear it. Had she not sworn that she was a widow? The Duke had insisted that she should plead her marriage, to avoid her debts contracted at Gloucester-Place, or else she might go to prison; and when she applied to him for a few hundred pounds, he returned for answer, that if she dared to speak against him, or to write against him, he would put her in the pillory, or in the Bastile. Who brought this message respecting the pillory? said the Attorney-General. A very particular friend of the Duke of York's, replied Mrs. Clarke, one Taylor, a shoe-maker in Bond-Street. By whom was the request sent for a few hundreds? By my own pen, said Mrs. Clarke. How was the letter sent? By this ambassador of Morocco. Who do you call by that name? The lady's shoe-maker. Here the chairman admonished the witness of the impropriety of giving her evidence in this flippant and unbecoming manner, and apprised her, that if she persevered in such conduct, she would expose herself to a heavy censure. Mr. Sheridan, in the examination on the 17th of February, sprang a new mine of discoveries, by asking Mrs. Clarke if she had ever any negociations respecting promotions unconnected with the military department—in the church for instance? Yes, said the witness, several; among others, Dr. O'Meara, an Irish divine, applied to me to be made a Bishop; and the Duke of York, at my request, procured him an opportunity of preaching before royalty at Weymouth; but the Duke told me that the King did not like the great O in the doctor's name, and the negociation failed. This story was at first thought incredible, but a letter from the Duke of York, produced on the investigation, proved that his Royal Highness had actually corresponded with his mistress on this subject.

On

On the 17th of March the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward his resolution, modified by more mature consideration, and expressed in these terms: "That this House having appointed a committee to investigate the conduct of the Duke of York, as Commander-in-Chief, and having carefully considered the evidence which came before the said committee, and finding that personal corruption, and connivance at corruption, have been imputed to his said Royal Highness, find it expedient to pronounce a distinct opinion upon the said imputation, and are accordingly of opinion that it is wholly without foundation." This motion having been put, was carried, by 278, against 196. Previously to the divisions it was generally understood that the Duke of York had come to the determination to resign his office of Commander-in-Chief; and on the 20th of March the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose in his place to announce, that his Royal Highness, having obtained a complete acquittal of those criminal charges which had been moved against him, was desirous of giving way to that public sentiment which those charges, however ill-founded, had unfortunately drawn down upon him; that, under these circumstances, he had tendered to his Majesty his resignation of the office of Commander-in-Chief, and that the King had been graciously pleased to accept the same. On the resignation of the Duke of York, the office of Commander-in-Chief was conferred on General Sir David Dundas; and one of the first consequences of the investigation was the enactment of a law, declaring the brokerage of offices, either in the army, the church, or the state, to be a crime highly penal.*

The navy and army estimates of this year were nearly the same as in 1808; as was, indeed, the whole system of finance.†

The recent exposure of public abuses led to the introduction of a bill into the House of Commons by Mr. Curwen, for better securing the purity and independence of Parliament, by preventing the procuring or obtaining seats by corrupt practices, and also for the more effectual prevention of bribery. This bill ultimately passed into a law.

Sir Francis Burdett next submitted to the consideration of the House of Commons a plan of Parliamentary reform, resembling, in the leading features, the plan proposed by the Duke of Richmond thirty years before. His motion was, "that this House will, early in the next session of Parliament, take into consideration the necessity of a reform in the representation." Other members contended, that the plan now proposed would never produce the effects anticipated from it, unless the mover of the measure could alter, not only our political constitution, but the frame of the human mind; unless he could at once get rid of human prejudices and human passions. On a division of the House, it was negatived, by 74 against 15.‡

In the spring of this year, the French fleet, consisting of eight sail of the line and two frigates, escaped from the harbour of Brest, and run into the mouth of the Charente, where, joined by four sail of the line and two frigates, they anchored under the batteries. In this situation it was determined to attack them; and Lord Cochrane, in the Imperieuse, was dispatched from England on this arduous and hazardous service. On the 10th of April a number of vessels, and transports filled with Congreve's rockets, joined Lord Gambier's fleet; and the preparations for the attack were immediately begun. The fitting up and management of the explosion ship were entirely intrusted to Lord Cochrane, who determined that nothing should be wanting to render

* In the course of the investigation into the conduct of the Duke of York, it was ascertained, that there was a regular, systematic, and almost avowed traffic in the East India appointments, as well as in subordinate places under government. These discoveries led to the appointment of a committee of the House of Commons to inquire into the abuse of the East India patronage; and from the report of that body it appeared, that a vast number of cadetships and writerships had been disposed of in an illegal manner. To remedy so great an evil, Mr. Thelluson, one of the directors, deeply implicated in these transactions, was, at the usual annual election, rejected by a great majority; and the court, after long and animated debates, determined, that all those young men named by the committee of the House of Commons as having obtained their appointments by corrupt practices, should be deprived of their employments and recalled from India. The examination of the witnesses by the committee appointed to inquire into the abuse of India patronage, developed transactions intimately connected with the character of the House of Commons, and the proceedings of some of its most distinguished members; and on the 25th of April, Lord Archibald Hamilton rose to submit a motion to the House, grounded on the conduct of Lord Castlereagh, who, in his evidence before that committee, had stated, that he, in 1805, delivered into the hands of his friend Lord Clancarty a writership, of which he had the gift, for the purpose of exchanging it for a seat in Parliament. This negociation, it appeared, was carried on between Lord Castlereagh and a Mr. Reding, an advertising place-broker, who was a perfect stranger to his Lordship. The treaty was opened by letter; and it appeared from the evidence on the table of the House, that Lord Castlereagh told Mr. Reding that he did not want a seat for himself, but for one of his friends. Different meetings took place between Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Reding, but the nomination to the writership did not finally take place, and the negociation was broken off. Lord Castlereagh expressed his sorrow, that any act of his, or rather any intention, could be deemed such as to call for Parliamentary inquiry; the case before them had no reference to pecuniary transactions; and he could only regret that any motives of private friendship or of public zeal should have induced him to do any thing requiring the cognizance of that House. If he had erred it was unintentionally, and he would submit with patience to any censure which he might be thought to have incurred: having made this declaration, his Lordship bowed to the chair and retired. Lord A. Hamilton then moved, "That it appears to this House, from the evidence upon the table, that Lord Viscount Castlereagh, in the year 1805, he having just quitted the office of president of the board of controul, and being then a privy-counsellor, and one of his Majesty's Secretaries of State; did deliver up into the hands of Lord Clancarty, a writership, of which he had the gift, for the purpose of exchanging it for a seat in Parliament. That merely from the disagreements of some subordinate agents employed, this design was not carried into effect. That such conduct was a dereliction of his duty, as president of the board of controul, a gross violation of his engagements as a servant of the crown, and an attack on the purity and constitution of the House. A long debate ensued, in which it was contended, by the friends of Lord Castlereagh, that the intention ought not to be punished with the same severity as the actual commission of an offence. There was no malus animus; no corrupt design appeared in the whole transaction; and it was evident that the noble Lord had not acted in his official capacity, but merely as an individual wishing to oblige his friend. It was on the other hand contended, that the intention manifested and acknowledged by Lord Castlereagh was sufficient to establish his criminality; and that if the negociation failed, it was not for want of inclination on the part of the noble Lord. At the close of the debate, the House divided, when the motion of Lord A. Hamilton was rejected by 213 against 167. A motion was afterwards proposed, and carried, to the effect, that it was the duty of the House of Commons to maintain and guard the purity and independence of Parliament; but that the intended charge not having been carried into effect, no criminatory proceeding appeared to the House to be necessary.

† The fourth report of the committee of public expenditure was received with considerable surprise; and the disclosures it exhibited regarding the conduct of the commissioners appointed to manage, sell, and dispose of the Dutch ships detained or brought into the ports of Great Britain, forcibly awakened the public indignation. This document stated that the commissioners were five in number, namely, James Crawford, John Breckwood, Allen Chatfield, Alexander Baxter, and John Bowles; that the appointment of the commissioners took place in the year 1795, and that their transactions were nearly brought to a close in 1799. As no fixed remuneration had been assigned to them, they resolved to remunerate themselves, and charged a commission of five per cent on the gross proceeds of their sales, which commission amounted in all to 132,000*l.* being at the rate of 26,000*l.* for each commissioner. Not satisfied with this enormous allowance, the money intrusted to their hands was employed in discounting private bills for their own emolument, and when an application was made to them by Mr. Pitt, in 1796, to pay a sum of money into the exchequer, in aid of the public exigencies, they refused to afford any relief to the state, although it was now obvious that they had at that time in their hands a balance amounting to 190,000*l.* After an animated discussion, the House resolved that the commissioners, taking advantage of the omission of the government to inquire into their proceedings, had, without authority, appropriated to their own use large sums of the public money, and had thereby been guilty of a flagrant violation of public duty.

‡ Mr. Wardle observed, that an efficient reform in the Commons House of Parliament would ensure to the people in their representatives active supporters of their rights and faithful guardians of their purse; and he did not hesitate to say, that in such an event, the amount of the income tax might be saved to the public. This declaration he was loudly called upon to explain; and on the 19th of June, he recapitulated the savings he had calculated upon, and stated them to be in the army 6,182,000*l.*; in the navy 5,822,000*l.*; in the management of the revenue 1,110,000*l.*; commissions of accounts and inquiry 75,000*l.*; pensions 300,000*l*; colonies 500,000*l.*; bounties 150,000*l.*; allowance in management of debt 210,000*l.*; military expenditure of Ireland 2,00,000*l.*; making an aggregate saving of 16,349,000*l.* per annum. In order to show how these savings might be effected, Mr. Wardle moved for a large mass of accounts in the respective departments of the state to which he had referred, the whole of which documents were ordered to be laid on the table; but two days afterwards Parliament was prorogued.

the preparations complete; for that purpose he caused puncheons, placed with the ends upwards, to be filled with gunpowder, and 1,500 barrels of this death-dispensing combustible were employed to charge the puncheons; on the top of which nearly 400 shells with fusees were placed, and in the intermediate space about 3,000 hand grenades. That the explosion might be as violent and destructive as possible, the puncheons were fastened together by cables, and kept steady and immoveable by wedges, and sand rammed down between them. To this floating volcano, Lord Cochrane, with one Lieutenant and four seamen, committed himself. On the 11th, the fire-ships, led on by Captain Wooldridge, and the explosion ship, bearing its small adventurous crew, proceeded to the attack, favoured by a strong northerly wind and the flood tide. On the approach of the enemy's vessels, they perceived a boom stretched across the entrance of the roads in front of their line. This impediment, however, was soon broken through, and the English advanced, undismayed by the heavy fire from the forts on the Isle of Aix. Lord Cochrane, having approached with his ship as near to the enemy as possible, set fire to the fusee, and betook himself with his companions to the boat. Nine minutes after they had quitted the ship, and six minutes before the time calculated, she blew up, with a tremendous explosion, and scattered death and destruction in every direction. His Lordship no sooner reached his own ship, than he proceeded to attack the French vessels, and sustained their fire for some time before any other man of war entered the harbour. Early in the morning of the 12th, Lord Gambier, in consequence of a signal from Lord Cochrane, announcing that seven of the enemy's ships were on shore, and might be destroyed, made the signal to unmoor and weigh, but the wind and tide being against him, the Admiral was obliged to anchor again before he reached the roads. The enemy, availing themselves of this circumstance, succeeded in getting six of their ships up the river Charente. Four of the remaining ships were attacked by Lord Cochrane, in the Imperieuse, followed by the Revenge, the Indefatigable, and the Valiant, of 74 guns each: while the other ships advanced, his Lordship laid his vessel alongside of the Calcutta, and compelled her to surrender, although she had one-third more guns than the Imperieuse. His Lordship, supported by the other English men of war, next attacked the Ville de Varsovie, and the Aquilon, and succeeded in taking them, in the face of the tremendous fire from the batteries of Aix. These ships it was found impossible to get off, and they were destroyed, with the Tonnerre, another of the French squadron. By this brilliant and gallant achievment, one ship of 120 guns, 5 of 74 guns, and 2 frigates were driven on shore, and either totally destroyed or rendered useless; one of 80 guns, 2 of 74, and one of 50 guns, with 3 frigates, were burnt, and the French had the mortification to perceive that their ships could not be secured from British intrepidity and skill, even by the batteries of their own forts, and the intricate and dangerous navigation of their own bays. In the course of this enterprise, Lord Cochrane displayed his humanity in as signal and noble a manner as his courage. A captain of one of the French seventy-fours, when delivering his sword to his Lordship, lamented that the conflagration of his ship, which was just about to take place, would destroy all the property he possessed. On hearing this, Lord Cochrane instantly went into the boat along with him, in order, if possible, to rescue the captain's property from the devouring element; but, unfortunately, his Lorship's humane intentions were frustrated in a most shocking manner: as they passed a French ship, which was on fire, her loaded guns went off, and one of the balls striking the French captain, killed him by the side of his generous conqueror.*

The difference between England and America this year assumed a more confirmed character, and while both countries professed an anxious desire for the revival of those amicable relations which had been so long interrupted, such was the tendency of the measures pursued, that a state of actual hostility was fast approaching.†

After the breaking out of the war between France and Austria, the English government made preparations for a large and formidable expedition, and 40,000 troops, to be assisted by 35 sail of the line, and about 200 sail of smaller vessels, were assembled on the coast of Kent and Hampshire. It was the intention of government to keep the destination of the expedition a secret; but, long before its departure the point of attack was generally known in England, and publicly announced in the French Journals. It is probable, however, that the original intention was at once to make a diversion in favour of Austria, and to secure an object exclusively British. The expedition was fitted out in the most complete manner; and the command was conferred on the Earl of Chatham; a man, unfortunately, proverbial for indolence and inactivity. On the 28th and 29th of July, the expedition sailed from the Downs; and on the 1st of August Flushing was invested. On the 13th the batteries were completed, and the frigates and smaller vessels, having taken their respective stations, the bombardment commenced on that day. The town suffered dreadfully from Congreve's rockets, but the fortifications were little injured. The French General, Monnet, the commander of the place, made an attempt to inundate the island; but this purpose was not so effected as materially to retard or impede our offensive operations. On the 14th, Sir Richard Strachan, our naval commander, cannonaded the town for some hours, with so much effect, that a summons was sent in; but some delay and difficulty having arisen, the attack recommenced,

* In addition to these and other services, the fleet of Lord Collingwood, in the Mediterranean, distinguished itself in the cause of the Spanish patriots. Towards the end of October, 8 sail of the line, 4 frigates, and 20 large transports, were dispatched from Toulon, under the French Admiral Baudin, to the relief of Barcelona. As soon as this fleet was discovered, Lord Collingwood gave orders to Admiral Martin to chase them. The sight of the English fleet was the signal for the flight of the French; and, to escape their pursuers, the line of battle ships, and one frigate, ran ashore between Cette and Frontignan, where they were set on fire by their crews, and destroyed, to prevent them from falling into the hands of the British. The transports separated from the men of war, and took refuge in the bay of Rosas; where, under the shelter of an armed store-ship, two bombards, and a xebeck, they seemed to regard themselves secure; but in this situation they were attacked by Captain Hallowell, who headed the boats of the English squadron, and notwithstanding a gallant resistance, every ship and vessel of the enemy was either burnt or brought off, in the sight of thousands of spectators, who witnessed the humiliation of their countrymen, and the resistless bravery of the British seamen. In the West Indies, the Island of Martinique, and the city of St. Domingo, were added to our numerous possessions; and the colony of Cayenne, under the government of Victor Hugues, fell an easy conquest to a combined attack made by English and Portuguese troops. In the east, the Island of Bourbon surrendered to the English on the 21st of September, and nearly about the same time, the small Grecian Islands of Zante, Cephalonia, Ithaca, and Cerigo, acknowledged the British flag.

† For the purpose of removing one of the most irritating parts of the British orders in council, the board of trade, in the beginning of April issued certain regulations, that all neutral vessels were at liberty to trade with any port whatever, except those in a state of actual blockade; and the blockade was expressly defined to extend to the whole coast of France, Holland, and the ports of Italy under the dominion of France. America was therefore permitted to trade with Russia, Denmark, Sweden, and all the ports of the Baltic, without molestation. About the same time that these regulations were issued in England, an assurance was given to the American Secretary of State, by the Hon. D. M. Erskine, the British minister to the United States, that his Majesty's orders in council, of January and November, 1807, would be withdrawn, as respected the United States, on the 10th of June next, in the persuasion that the president would issue a a proclamation for the renewal of the intercourse with Great Britain. In virtue of this assurance, Mr. Madison, the President, issued a proclamation on the following day, announcing that the trade between England and America would be renewed on the 10th of June. This pleasing prospect was dispelled, by the discovery, that the arrangements entered into by Erskine with the American government, were unauthorised by his instructions, and that, therefore, his Britannic Majesty did not deem it proper or advisable to carry them into effect. Mr. Jackson was appointed to supersede Mr. Erskine. Previously to the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, the American government finding the embargo to fall with a severe pressure upon every part of the community, had raised the embargo, as to all other nations, and a system of non-intercourse and non-importation towards England and France, was substituted in its stead. By this act of Congress, all voyages to the British and French dominions, and all trade in articles of British or French manufacture, were prohibited; with the reservation, however, that whichever of the belligerents should so revoke or modify her edicts, that they should cease to violate the commerce of the United States, the trade with that country should be renewed.

menced, and the advanced post was carried at the point of the bayonet. The next day the enemy demanded a suspension of arms, which was succeeded by the surrender of the town, and the garrison, amounting to more than 4,000 troops, were made prisoners of war. Soon afterwards a rumour reached England that no ulterior operations would be undertaken; and it appeared that no decision on this point was made before the 27th of August, when Sir Richard Strachan, having waited upon Lord Chatham in person to learn his Lordship's plans, was informed that he had come to the determination not to advance. The French had not been inactive: every preparation was made to oppose the passage both of our army and navy; the interior of the Netherlands, and of France as far as Paris, was stripped of the national guards: and an army, formidable for numbers, if not from discipline and experience, had actually been collected for the defence of Antwerp and the shipping; the naval stores were removed, and preparations were made for conveying the ships so high up the river, as to put them beyond the reach of either the invading army or navy. Lord Chatham, with a great proportion of the troops, at length returned to England; and the rest found it expedient to give up all their conquests but the Island of Walcheren. This pestilential station it was resolved to keep, for the purpose of shutting up the mouth of the Scheldt, and for enabling our merchants to introduce British merchandise into Holland. But, from this island, the sole fruit of one of the most formidable and expensive expeditions ever sent from this country, we were doomed to be driven by an enemy more cruel and destructive than the French. A malady of the most fatal kind soon shewed itself among the troops, and shewed the necessity for immediate recall; but, it was not till a great proportion of the forces had either died of the prevailing epidemic, or been rendered incapable of performing their duty, that the fortifications were destroyed, and the island was evacuated in the sight of an enemy, who, aware that the ravages of disease would render attack unnecessary, took no measures to expel the British forces from the scene of death.

Two circumstances of a very opposite nature—the intrigues and disputes among the ministry, and the celebration of a jubilee, on the King having attained the fiftieth year of his reign—now attracted the attention of the people. On the 21st of September, a duel took place between Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Canning, two members of the cabinet; the former, Secretary for the War and Colonial Department, the latter, Secretary for Foreign Affairs. The parties, who met on Putney-Heath, fired a first time without effect; and as the nature of the difference did not appear to the combatants to admit of explanation or apology, they fired at each other a second time, when Mr. Canning received his antagonist's ball in his right thigh.*

The day after the duel, Mr. Perceval, on whom, in consequence of the resignation of the Duke of Portland, the ostensible, as well as the real superintendence of the government of the country had fallen, wrote to Earl Grey and Lord Grenville, inviting them to co-operate with him, for the purpose of forming an extended and combined administration. These noblemen were in the country, and Earl Grey, in reply to Mr. Perceval's letter, declined coming to London, since it was utterly impossible for him to form an union with his Majesty's ministers, with any hope of promoting the interests of the country. Lord Grenville immediately repaired to town; but the day after his arrival he sent a reply, objecting to an union with his Majesty's present ministers, and adding, that his objections were not personal, but applied "to the principle of the government itself, and to the circumstances which attended its appointment." After this refusal, Mr. Perceval applied to several public men, who were known to be generally favourable to the line of politics which he had pursued; and the arrangements were at length completed.†

For the third time in the annals of the country, this year beheld a monarch deservedly dear to his people, enter the fiftieth year of his reign. In celebration of this day, numerous institutions of benevolence and utility were founded in various parts of the empire; the hungry were fed; the naked were clothed; the prison doors were thrown open to numbers of unfortunate debtors; and every heart which man was capable of making glad rejoiced on this memorable day.‡

Subsequently to the battle of Corunna, the attention and movements of the French were principally directed to the pursuit and discomfiture of the Spanish corps, which still occupied the centre of the kingdom, and to the occupation of such of the sea-ports in the north and east as kept open the communication with England, or that contained the Spanish navy. Accordingly, in the centre of Spain the Duke of Belluno attacked and defeated the division of the Duc del Infantado's army, under the command of General Venegas; while in the north the Duke of Dalmatia advanced to Ferrol, and, through the pusillanimity and perfidy of the civil and military authorities, made himself master of that place, as well as the fleet moored in the harbour. The next place against which the operations of the French were directed was Oporto, and of this city, though defended by 24,000 troops and 200 pieces of cannon, the Duke of Dalmatia possessed himself without encountering any formidable resistance.§

Early in the year, a solemn treaty of peace and alliance was entered into between Great Britain and the authorities

---

* This duel was preceded by a letter from Lord Castlereagh to Mr. Canning; in which his Lordship accused the foreign secretary of having clandestinely endeavoured to procure his removal from his situation, and of having obtained a positive promise to that effect from the Duke of Portland.

Nearly a month elapsed before Mr. Canning found himself prepared to enter on his defence; and in the mean time the ministry was completely dissolved. The Duke of Portland gave in his resignation, on account of his age and infirmities; and Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Canning resigned. At length Mr. Canning's statement made its appearance. In this document it was admitted that the proposal and plan for Lord Castlereagh's dismissal continued from Easter till September; but Mr. Canning contended that it was entirely owing to his Lordship's friends that the actual dismission was delayed till the termination of the expedition to the Scheldt. The principal point on which he insisted was, that he supposed his colleague knew that his dismissal was in contemplation, and that the proposal originated with him.

† Mr. Perceval himself took the office of First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer; the Marquis of Wellesley succeeded to the foreign department; Lord Liverpool was tranferred from the home to the department of war and colonies; Mr. Ryder was appointed to succeed Lord Liverpool; and Lord Palmerston was at the same time appointed Secretary at War, in the room of Sir James Pulteney.

‡ On this day of Jubilee, it appeared that the short period of twenty years had swept from their thrones all the sovereigns of Europe, that monarch alone excepted whose long and eventful reign the national festival of the 25th of October, 1809, was appointed to celebrate:

Louis XVI. King of France, deposed 10th of August, 1792, executed January 21st, 1793.
Louis XVII. died in the Temple, June 9th, 1795.
Joseph II. Emperor of Germany, Leopold II. Emperor of Germany, Catharine II. Empress of Russia, Frederic-William II. King of Prussia, Christian VII. King of Denmark — Died — Feb. 20th. 1790; March 1st. 1792; Nov. 17th, 1796; Nov. 16th, 1797; March 13th, 1808.
Stanislaus, King of Poland, deposed Nov. 25th, 1795; died Feb. 12th, 1798.
Pope Pius VI. deposed February, 1798; died August 19th, 1798.
William V. Stadtholder of Holland, deposed, Jan. 1795; died, April, 1806.
Charles Emmanuel, King of Sardinia, Charles IV. and Ferdinand VII. Kings of Spain, Gustavus Adolphus IV. King of Sweden, Pope Pius VII. Ferdinand VI. King of Naples. — Deposed — June 4th, 1801; May, 1808; March 13, 1809; June 1st. 1809; Jan. 23d, 1799.
Gustavus III. King of Sweden, Paul I. Emperor of Russia, Selim III. Grand Seignor, — Assassinated — March 27th, 1792; March 22d, 1801; May 29th, 1807.
Maria Frances Isabella, Queen of Portugal, expatriated, Nov. 1807.

§ Early in April, the principal Spanish and French armies occupied the following positions: the Marquis del Romana was at Villafranca; General Cuesta, having been joined by the division under the Duc d'Albuquerque, had halted in his retreat before the French at Talavera; General Reding, having suffered severely in an attempt to surprise Barcelona, and in a succession of engagements near Taragona, had been reinforced by the army of General Blake, and was, with that General, employed in opposing the progress of the French in Catalonia. Of the French forces, Soult was at Oporto; Ney in the neigbourhood of Corunna and Ferrol; and Victor was advancing towards authorities administering the Spanish government in the name of Ferdinand the VII.*

Sir Arther Wellesley sailed from Portsmouth on the 15th of April, and arrived at Lisbon on the 22d, to take the command of the British army, which, by reinforcements sent principally from Ireland, had been increased to 30,000 men. Sir Arthur determined to dispossess the French under Soult of the city of Oporto; and with this view he assembled the British army at Coimbra, on the 7th of May, and advanced towards the Douro. Soult, aware of the magnitude of the opposing force, withdrew the main body of his army, and Oporto fell into the hands of the British almost without resistance. Sir Arthur Wellesley, having placed that city in a proper state of defence, returned to the south of Portugal, to protect Lisbon and its vicinity from the French army, which was advancing along the Tagus, under Marshal Victor.

In the north-east of Spain, prodigies of valour had been displayed; the second siege of Saragossa rivalled the first, and will for ever occupy a distinguished place in the military annals of the country.† After the fall of Saragossa, an attempt was made by General Blake to regain possession of that city, but in this he entirely failed, and the Spanish army under his commad became exposed to a fatal and inglorious defeat at Belchite. ‡

Sir Arthur Wellesley had concerted a plan with General Cuesta, to attack the central French armies, and to obtain possession of Madrid. With this view, a junction of the British and Spanish forces took place in the neighbourhood of Plasencia, on the 20th of July. Sir Robert Wilson, who commanded a Portuguese corps, which he had brought into a state of excellent discipline, was ordered to advance to Ascolona, on the river Alberche. The division of the Spanish General, Venegas, at the same time broke up from Madrilejos, and advanced to Arganda. After these preparatory movements had been made, the combined British and Spanish army, amounting to about 60,000 men, of which 20,000 were British, proceeded to Talavera, where the French army, under Victor, 35,000 strong, had been for some time stationed. On the 22d the allied forces moved upon Oropesa, and drove in Victor's rear-guard, which was drawn up in order of battle upon a plain about a league from Talavera. The hostile armies were now in sight of each other, and Sir Arthur Wellesley determined to attack the French General the following day, and to bring him to action before he should be joined by Joseph Buonaparte and Sebastiani, who were marching to his relief. For this purpose the British columns were formed at five o'clock in the morning; but, at the moment when the troops were ready to advance, they learned, that General Cuesta, not wishing to profane the sabbath, had determined to delay the attack till the following day. On the morning of the 24th, the British and Spanish armies were again drawn out; but Victor had, during the evening of the Sunday, retreated from his position, to effect a junction with other divisions of the French army of the centre; and so deficient was the combined army in the means of transport, that it was found impossible to pursue the enemy. This inconvenience had long been felt, and Sir Arthur Wellesley now came to the determination to return to Portugal, unless more vigorous exertions should be made by the supreme junta to supply the wants of his army. Cuesta appeared fully sensible of the propriety of this resolution, and, trusting that the possession of Madrid, which seemed now almost within his reach, would relieve all the wants by which the combined army was surrounded, he determined to advance in the pursuit of Victor. On the 25th, the French force, under Joseph Buonaparte and General Sebastiani, formed a junction with Marshal Victor at Toledo, by which their force amounted to 35,000 men; and General Cuesta, unable to withstand so formidable an army, fell back, in disorder, and with considerable loss, upon the English position at Talavera. As it was now obvious that the enemy intended to try the result of a general action, Sir Arthur Wellesley selected the neighbourhood of Talavera as the scene of operations. About two o'clock in the afternoon of the 27th, the enemy appeared in strengh upon the left bank of the Alberche, and manifested an intention to attack General Mackenzie, who had been placed, with a division of infantry, and a brigade of cavalry, as an advanced post, in a wood which covered the left flank of the British army. These troops suffered considerably, but they were withdrawn in perfect order, and took their place in the line. The enemy now cannonaded the left of the British position, and attacked the Spanish infantry with his horse, hoping to break the ranks, and carry the town; but he was bravely withstood, and finally repulsed. Early in the evening, Marshal Victor pushed a division along the valley, on the left of a height occupied by General Hill; this he considered the key of the British position, and the efforts of the French to obtain this eminence corresponded with the estimation in which it was held. For a moment the attack was successful; but General Hill instantly charged the assailants with the bayonet, and regained the post. The French repeated their attack about midnight; but they were again repulsed with great slaughter. Both armies passed the night on the field, and several partial engagements were fought before the ensuing dawn. In these night combats, the men, after they had discharged their fire-arms, frequently closed, and beat out each other's brains with their muskets. The French having ascertained that any attack upon the town, posted as the Spaniards were, was hopeless, at day-break on the 28th, General Ruffin advanced with three regiments in close columns against the eminence occupied by General Hill; but here again they were resisted by the bayonet, and driven back, leaving the field covered with their slain. About eleven o'clock, the enemy, finding himself baffled in all his efforts, suspended the attack, and dined upon the field of battle. Wine and bread were at the same time served out to the British troops, and during this pause in the work of destruction, the men in both armies repaired to a brook wards Lisbon, by the route of Badajoz, with the Spanish force under General Cuesta in his front. The only engagement worthy of notice, was fought between Marshal Victor and General Cuesta, at Medellin, a town of Estramadura, equi-distant from Merida and Truxillo. In this, the patriots lost, according to the French accounts, 1,400 men in killed and wounded, with six standards, and the whole of their artillery.

* By this treaty, negociated on the part of the Spaniards by Don Pedro Cevallos, his Britannic Majesty pledged himself to assist the Spanish nation in their struggle against the tyranny and usurpation of France, and not to acknowledge any other King of Spain and the Indies than his Majesty Ferdinand VII. his heirs, and lawful successors.

† A body of about 10,000 men, who had escaped from the battle of Tudela, had thrown themselves into Saragossa, and the citizens and peasants from the country swelled the number of its defenders to about 50,000. The second siege was commenced about the middle of December, 1808, and Palafox ordained, that all the inhabitants, of whatever rank or condition, should consider themselves bound to devote their persons, their property, and their lives, to the defence of the city. On the 10th of January the bombardment began. The French, aware that the only way to conquer Saragossa was to destroy it house by house, and street by street, proceeded upon this system, and three companies of miners and eight companies of sappers were continually employed in carrying on this subterraneous war. During the bombardment, which continued 42 days, there was no respite either by day or night for this devoted city. After a glorious defence, the garrison began to experience a want of ammunition, which was succeeded by the horrors of famine, and a pestilential disease appearing at this moment in the city, served to complete the dreadful climax. On the 1st of February, the situation of the place appeared hopeless; but the Governor-General still refused to capitulate, and for 17 days more the defence was continued; when Palafox himself being siezed with the contagion, was obliged to transfer his authority to a Junta, of which Don Pedro Maria Ric was appointed president. On the 19th the enemy obtained a possession of the Puerto del Angel, and to such a deplorable situation was the garrison reduced by its accumulated miseries, that all the efforts of Don Ric proved fruitless. Disease had subdued the inhabitants; two thirds of the city had been destroyed; 30,000 of the people had perished, and from 3 to 4,000 were dying daily of the pestilence. Reduced to this situation, the city capitulated, and the French, after a siege of two months, obtained possession of a mass of ruins.

‡ According to the account of this battle, published by the Spanish General, one of his regiments was thrown into confusion by the discharge of the enemy's grenades; the panic spread rapidly; regiment after regiment fled without discharging a gun; and in a short time, the General and his officers were left alone to oppose the enemy. The fruits of this victory, were nine pieces of cannon, immense quantities of stores and provisions, and upwards of 3,000 prisoners.

to

to quench their thirst, and stooped to the stream in the presence of each other without molestation: numbers of them even shook hands across the brook before the battle recommenced. About noon, Victor ordered a general attack with his whole force upon that part of the position of the allies which was ocupied by the British army.

In consequence of the repeated attacks made upon the left, Sir Arthur Wellesley had now placed two brigades of British cavalry in the valley, supported in the rear by the Duc d'Albuquerque's division of Spanish cavalry. The general attack began by the march of several columns of infantry into the valley, with a view to make another attack on the height occupied by General Hill. From the moment this operation commenced, the firing of the musketry was heard on all sides like the roll of a drum, with scarcely a moment's interruption, during the remainder of the day; and the deeper sound of the heavy cannonade resembled continual peals of thunder. The operations of the French were deranged by Leval's division, which, instead of forming in echellon in the rear, advanced to the front. Sebastiani, perceiving the blunder committed by this division, sent a brigade to extricate Leval from his perilous situation, which, after considerable loss, was effected. This attack upon the hill was formidable in the extreme, but, like all the former, it failed. The French General, La Pisse, who was the first to cross the ravine, was mortally wounded, and his men were driven back with severe loss. About three o'clock in the afternoon the enemy again advanced to the attack, with his whole force. Marshal Victor had resolved to storm and carry the heights which had so repeatedly and so successfully defied his former attempts; and placing himself at the head of his troops, he led them to the foot of the hill, while General Vilatte advanced to his support from the valley. At this moment General Anson's brigade, consisting of the 1st German light dragoons, and the 23d dragoons, with General Fane's brigade of heavy cavalry, were ordered to attack the French, who had formed in two solid squares, protected by a deep ditch, and supported by a tremendous fire of musketry and artillery. Here the brunt of the action lay; numbers of men and horses fell into the ditch, which, till now, had been undiscovered, and numbers were mown down by the artillery; but still the columns advanced, and made a desperate charge upon the solid and impenetrable squares of the enemy. The British suffered dreadfully; and the 23d regiment in particular was almost annihilated. This gallant attempt, although it was not attended with success, had the effect of preventing the execution of the enemy's plan, and no further attempt was made upon the hill, which was now covered with the dead and the dying. The attack upon the centre was repulsed by Brigadier-General Alexander Campbell, supported by the King's regiment of Spanish cavalry, and two regiments of Spanish infantry; and while the Spaniards turned the enemy's flank, the English took their cannon. At the same time an attack was made upon Lieutenant-General Sherbrook's division, which was on the left and centre of the first line of the British army. This attack was gallantly repulsed by a charge with the bayonet by the whole division; but the brigade of guards, impelled by their military ardour, advanced too far, and laid themselves open, on the left flank, both to the fire of the enemy's batteries and to their retiring columns. The enemy lost not a moment in seizing the advantage that now presented itself, and for some time the fate of the day appeared more than doubtful. At this crisis, the skill and foresight of Sir Arthur Wellesley turned the current of success which had set in so strongly against him, and secured a victory which had so long hung in suspense. Seeing the guards advance, and aware of the danger to which they would be exposed, Sir Arthur Wellesley moved a battalion of the 48th from the heights to their support; and this timely succour, with the assistance of the second line of General Cotton's brigade of cavalry, enabled the guards to extricate themselves from the impending danger, and decided the fate of the battle. Soon after the repulse of the general attack, the enemy commenced his retreat in the most regular order across the Alberche, leaving twenty pieces of cannon in the hands of the combined army.

The loss on both sides was severe; the enemy had entire brigades of infantry destroyed; and his loss in the engagements of the 27th and 28th was estimated by the English commander at 10,000 men. On the same authority it is stated, that the British had 800 killed, 3,000 wounded, and 650 missing, exclusive of the loss of the Spaniards, which amounted to 1,250 in killed and wounded.*

The English army had scarcely had time to congratulate itself on the achievement of this brilliant victory when intelligence was received, that the Marshals Soult, Ney, and Mortier, had advanced through Estremadura, and were already in the rear of the combined British and Spanish army. There was no time for hesitation or delay; a retreat had become indispensible, and promptitude alone could save the army. The bridge of Almarez, by which one of the divisions of the English was to have crossed the Tagus, was destroyed, and the bridge of Arzobispo alone remained for the passage of the whole army. As no doubt could be entertained that Victor's army would again advance as soon as he heard of the approach of the French forces through Estremadura, it became necessary that part of the combined troops should remain at Talavera, as well for the purpose of checking the advance of the French, as for taking care of the sick and wounded of the combined army. Cuesta was accordingly left at Talavera, where it was hoped he might be able to maintain his position; but, in any event, it was understood that he should by no means abandon the wounded. On the 3d of August, the British force left Talavera, and marched to Oropesa, on the way to Plasentia, with an intention to attack the force under Soult. On the evening of that day, Sir Arthur Wellesley received information that Cuesta meant to quit Talavera immediately; and that, for want of conveyance, he should be obliged to abandon his hospitals.† Surrounded by difficulties, with an army of 30,000 men, under Soult, pressing upon him from the north, and with an army equally strong under Victor, advancing from the east, the British General determined to retreat, and to take up a position at Deleytosa, on the way to Truxillo. Here he remained unmolested by the French, and was enabled to recruit his army; but, finding that the Junta were by no means disposed to supply the wants which had prevented his pursuit of the French before the battle of Talavera, he determined to retreat to Badajoz, where, during the remainder of the year, his army continued inactive, and exposed, from the unhealthiness of the situation, to the ravages of a fatal epidemic.‡

The Marquis Wellesley, appointed ambassador ex-

* On this occasion, the King was most graciously pleased to command that his royal approbation of the conduct of the army serving under the command of Lieutenant General Sir Arthur Wellesley, should be publicly declared in general orders. These sentiments were acquiesced in by both branches of the legislature, who voted the thanks of Parliament to Sir Arthur Wellesley, and to the officers and men under his command; and as a special mark of his Majesty's favour and approbation, the Commander-in-Chief was, on the 26th of August, elevated to the peerage, by the title of Viscount Wellington of Talavera and of Wellington, and Baron Douro of Wellesley, in the county of Somerset.

† The Spanish General was not deficient in personal gallantry, but he was obstinate, intractable, and unfit for command; and his reason for leaving the sick and wounded, by quitting his station even before the French approached, seemed to partake of the imbecility of old age: it was not that he had any apprehension for the safety of his own army, but he was afraid that Sir Arthur Wellesley would not be able to contend with the French force that was coming against him; and he had in consequence left Talavera that he might be enabled to support his British ally.

‡ When Sir Arthur Wellesley, and General Cuesta, were reduced to the necessity of retreating from Talavera, Sir Robert Wilson, who had pushed almost to the gates of Madrid, was suddenly recalled. This partisan corps did not arrive at Valada, till the night of the 4th of August, when the commander conceiving it too late to retire by the bridge of Arzobispo, was obliged to take the route of Banos, where he was attacked by Marshal Ney, and defeated. Sir Robert Wilson, on his defeat, retired along the mountains, and after a harassing march, succeeded at length in forming a junction with the British army.

traordinary to Spain, was received there with the greatest attention and respect. In his communications with the Junta, he pointed out the only course that could be pursued with any rational prospect of success; and, in particular, he pressed upon their attention, the propriety of calling forth and concentrating the military resources of the kingdom. He was also desirous of giving a tone to public opinion, of exciting and directing the national spirit, and of applying its energy to national objects. He accordingly recommended the appointment of a Council of Regency, and the speedy convocation of the Spanish Cortes. What effects might have resulted from the further exertion of the influence of the Marquis Wellesley, can only be conjectured; as, in the autumn of the year, he was recalled for the purpose of filling a distinguished office at home.†

A. D. 1810.] The members of the Supreme Central Junta having transferred their authority to a Council of Regency, at Leon, in the month of April (about the time when the French armies opened their batteries before Cadiz) the British cabinet made an attempt to rescue the person of Ferdinand out of the hands of Napoleon. The person employed in this mission, was an Irish adventurer of the name of Kelly; the plan, it appears, was concerted with the Marquis Wellesley, the English Secretary of State for foreign affairs, who had placed at Kelly's disposal a squadron off Quiberon, whence the Prince was to embark. Kelly, under pretence of having some valuable articles for sale, made his way to Valencay, the residence, or rather the place of imprisonment of Ferdinand, and endeavoured to speak with the Prince. To effect this purpose, he disclosed his intentions to the Infante, Don Antonio, and to Amazaga, the intendant of the royal prisoner's household. Ferdinand was no sooner made acquainted with Kelly's visit than he sent for Berthemy, the Governor of the Castle, and with the greatest emotion informed him, that an English emissary had found his way into the Castle, and that he was furnished with ample credentials to shew that he came from the British government. Kelly was immediately placed under arrest; and the vigilance of the French Governor over the person and suite of the imbecile monarch, was, if possible, increased by this unfortunate failure.

Lord Wellington, after the battle of Talavera, seemed to have abandoned all idea of advancing into Spain, and to have determined to direct and confine his operations to the defence of Portugal, till a more auspicious state of affairs should arise. As the force which this country could send into the Peninsula, was small in comparison with the immense armies of France, and as the Portuguese troops could not at first be expected to equal the British, it was expedient to defend Portugal in that particular spot, where inequality of numbers would be compensated by local and artificial strength, and where the means of supplying and increasing his force would be easy to the British General, † Early in August, soon after the battle of Talavera, General Vanegas, with an army computed at 30,000 men, descended from the mountains of the Sierra Morena, and on the 10th of that month, took up a strong position about three leagues from Toledo. On the advance of General Vanegas into the plain, he found himself opposed to a French corps under the command of General Sebastiani. On the commencement of the engagement, which took place on a rising ground beyond the village of Almonacid, near Toledo, his line was penetrated in every direction, by squadrons of French cavalry; and the Spaniards, incapable of sustaining the charge, threw down their arms and dispersed, leaving their baggage, artillery, and ammunition, in the hands of the enemy. This disaster was followed by a change in the command of the army of La Mancha, which was now taken from General Vanegas, and confided to the Marquis of Areizaga. This army was soon re-assembled, and increased to the number of 50,000 men. With this force, the new commander resolved to advance direct to Madrid. The French forces under Joseph Buonaparte took up, in consequence, a strong position near Toledo. The numbers of the Spanish army failed to inspire them with sufficient confidence to pursue their march, and instead of advancing, they retreated along the banks of the Tajo, followed by the enemy, who came up with them near Ocana. On the vast plain by which this place is surrounded, a general battle was fought on the 19th of November. The action commenced at eleven o'clock, and in less than two hours the fate of the day was completely decided. The Spaniards made a vigorous resistance; but, unfortunately, a regiment of cavalry appointed to cover a large body of Spanish infantry, gave way. The panic instantly became general, and the French pressed upon the deranged battalions, and completed their overthrow. According to the French accounts, 4000 men were left dead on the field of battle; 20,000 were made prisoners; and from 30 to 40,000 were muskets, 20 standards, 30 pieces of artillery, and an incredible quantity of baggage, were taken. The battle of Ocana was speedily followed by the reduction of Cordova and Seville, and a road was thus opened to Cadiz. The Junta issued a manifesto, dated at Seville, on the 28th of October, convoking the Cortes on the first day of the ensuing year, and appointing the 1st of March as the period upon which they were to enter upon their functions.

The Spanish armies, in the early part of November, consisted of three divisions; the army of the right under the command of General Blake; the army of the centre under Don Juan Carlos de Areizaga, and the Duc d'Albuquerque; and the army of the left under the command of the Duc del Parque. The forces under this General, amounting to about 30,000 men, were posted on the heights of Zamames, about six leagues to the south of Salamanca. The French army, under General Marchand, had for some time evinced, by their movements, an intention to lay siege to Ciudad Rodrigo, but their design could not be carried into effect till the Spaniards were dislodged from the neighbouring heights. To effect this purpose, General Marchand left Salamanca, and attacked the Duc del Parque in his strong position; but, after a long and obstinate contest, the assailants were compelled to retire, with the loss of 1000 men, and the Spaniards following up their success, obtained possession of Salamanca. The French, after their defeat at Zamames, gradually accumulated a force, amounting to 20,000 men, with an intention of making a second attack upon the army under the Spanish General, who had now occupied a position on the heights of Pena de Francia, in the vicinity of Salamanca. The Duc del Parque, seduced by the advantages he had already gained, and anxious to co-operate with the army of the centre, in the proposed advance to Madrid, quitted his strong position, and crossed over the Tormes to the right bank of that river. Here Marshal Kellerman was posted. The battle was fought at Alba, on the 28th of November, and terminated in the total defeat of the Spaniards; who, in their precipitate retreat, abandoned their baggage, and left in the hands of the enemy, 15 pieces of cannon, 6 standards, 10,000 muskets, and about 2000 prisoners.

The fortress of Gerona was compelled to surrender to Marshal Augereau, on the 10th of December, after having sustained a siege of nearly six months, and endured all the horrors of famine.—The close of the year, witnessed the successive defeat and dispersion of the principal armies of Spain, as well as the fall of several of the fortresses of that country.

Subsequently to the battle of Ocana, the French advanced into the south of Spain: knowing how easily the barrier of the Sierra Morena would be forced, they looked upon the possession of Cadiz as secure. The command of the army destined to this enterprise was vested in Soult, assisted by Victor and Mortier, and accompanied by Joseph Buonaparte, in person, who attended to take possession of the kingdom of Andalusia. On the advance of the enemy, the Spaniards under Areizaga, gave way at every point; and, on the 20th of January, 1810, the head-quarters of the French army were established at Baylen. Five days before the French entered Andalusia, the Supreme central Junta at Seville had announced their intention of transferring the seat of government to Cadiz, and the island of Leon was fixed upon as the place where the Cortes should hold their sittings. The Junta had now entirely lost the public confidence, and the termination of their power was at hand. Every hour brought fresh tidings of the progress of the enemy, and the murmurs of the people of Seville became louder as their agitation increased. The members of the government were hastening their departure for Cadiz; their equipages were conveyed to the quays, and the papers and archives from the public offices, were embarked on the Guadalquiver. A conspiracy had been forming for some days, at the head of which stood Count de Montijo, and Don Francisco Palafox, one of the members of the Junta, and brother of the hero of Saragossa. On the morning of the 24th, the populace assembled in the Square of St. Francisco, and in front of the Alcazar; some demanded the deposition of the Junta; others, more violent, insisted, that they had betrayed their country, and that they should be put to death; but the universal cry was, that the city should be defended, and that no person whatever his rank or authority, should be suffered to quit the place. In this emergency, Don Francisco de Saavedra, the minister of finance, was called upon to take the direction of public affairs. Montijo and Palafox, who had some days before been placed in duresse, by the Junta, on a charge of conspiring against the government, were liberated; and the Marquis Romana was nominated to the command of the army of the left, from which he had been lately removed by that body. The people, however, called upon Romana to take upon himself the defence of the city; but the Marquis evaded their importunities, and hastened to Badajoz to protect that important fortress; while Seville, incapable of withstanding the force by which it was soon after assailed, shared the fate of Cordova, and passed under the French yoke. Had it been possible that the fate of Spain could have depended upon any single event, it would have been the capture of Cadiz at this crisis; and the French, aware of its importance, advanced rapidly to the coast. The city was utterly unprepared for an attack; there were not 1000 troops in the island of Leon, and not as many volunteers as would man the works. At the time that the French advanced across the Sierra Morena, the Duc d'Albuquerque was on the banks of the Guadiana; but, by a rapid march of 200 miles, performed in eight days, he placed himself, on the 30th of January, between Cadiz and the French army, and, on the 2d of February, entered the island of Leon at the head of his small army, which consisted only of 8000 troops. Having saved this place by his prudence, the Duke lost no time in securing his possession; and the people hailed him as their deliverer, and conferred on him the office of Governor by general consent.

and

and proportionately difficult to the enemy. Lord Wellington soon perceived that no place in Portugal presented so favourable a situation for this purpose, as the lines of Torres Vedras, and he determined to make this his stand. This position was capable of being rendered absolutely impregnable: lying near the Tagus, his army could receive reinforcements and supplies readily from England, and his vicinity to the sea would enable him, in case of exigency, to embark without delay. The French General, on the other hand, would be in the very heart of a hostile country, the inhabitants of which were neither disposed nor able to supply his wants; and, from the nature of the war in the Peninsula, it would be extremely difficult to procure the supplies from any great distance. To render the defence of the lines of Torres Vedras, more effectual and secure, and to render the situation of the French, if they should advance to Lisbon, more difficult and desperate, Lord Wellington determined to retard the progress of the enemy as long as possible, without hazarding a general engagement. In furtherance of this plan, his Lordship, with his combined army of British, Spanish, and Portuguese, advanced, at the commencement of the summer, to the north-eastern frontier of Portugal; his force consisting, at that time, of about 30,000 British, and nearly 60,000 of the native armies.*

After the fall of Ciudad Rodrigo, which was defended with great bravery, and did not surrender till the fortress was no longer defensible, the French General advanced to the siege of Almeida. Massena opened his trenches before this fortress; on the 15th of August. While a false attack was made against the north of the town, 2000 men dug the first parallel to a depth of three feet; and, on Sunday, the 26th, at five o'clock in the morning, eleven batteries, mounted with 65 pieces of cannon, opened their fire. The garrison consisted of 5000 men, of whose spirit no doubt was entertained; the city was well provided, and its works had been placed in so respectable a state, that Lord Wellington felt assured the enemy would be detained till late in the season. These well-founded expectations were frustrated by one of those casualties which sometimes disconcert the wisest plans, and disappoint the surest hopes. On the night after the batteries opened, the large powder magazine in the citadel, blew up with a tremendous explosion. More than half the artillerymen, a great number of the garrison, and many of the inhabitants, perished; the guns were dismounted; and the works were rendered no longer defensible. The necessary and almost immediate consequence was, the surrender of the place, and all the troops in the garrison were made prisoners of war.—On the fall of Almeida, Massena advanced further into Portugal, and Lord Wellington retreated slowly before him, towards Coimbra. His Lordship resolved to take up a position on the Sierra de Busaco, and there to resist the advance of the French army. The British and Portuguese troops were posted along the ridge of the mountain or Sierra, extending nearly eight miles, and forming the segment of a circle, whose extreme points embraced every part of the enemy's position, and whence every movement below could be distinctly observed. On the 26th of September, the light troops on both sides were engaged throughout the line. At six o'clock on the following morning, the French, under Ney and Regnier, made two desperate attacks upon Lord Wellington's position; one on the right, the other on the left, of the highest point of the Sierra. The division under Ney, gained the top of the ridge, but was driven back with the bayonet; and another division, further to the right, was repulsed before it could reach the top of the mountain. On the left, the attack was made by three divisions, only one of which made any progress towards the summit, and this force being charged with the bayonet, was driven down with immense loss. The Portuguese soldiers established this day their character for courage and discipline. They were worthy, Lord Wellington said, to contend in the same ranks with British troops, in that good cause which they afforded the best hopes of saving.† The enemy, thus repulsed in his attempts to open a passage for his further advance into Portugal, accomplished by a manœuvre, what force had failed to effect. On the evening of the 28th, Lord Wellington observed the French army withdrawing from their position, and silently moving round the northern edge of the Sierra, whence they advanced to Avelans, on the high road to Coimbra. The British General had foreseen this movement, and had given orders to Colonel Trant, who commanded the Portuguese militia, to occupy Sardao; but the General officer who commanded in the north, having sent the Colonel round by Oporto, he was prevented from executing this order till the night of the 28th, when he found the French in possession of that place. In this situation, Lord Wellington, to prevent his army from being cut off from Coimbra, or compelled to fight a general action on disadvantageous ground, was under the necessity of quitting Busaco, and retreating to the left bank of the Mondego. In the afternoon of the 30th, the French advanced guard appeared in the front of Coimbra, and the next day, Lord Wellington continuing his retreat, fell back upon Leyria, and from thence to the lines of Torres Vedras.

So perfectly convinced was the French General, that the retreat of Lord Wellington was for the purpose of embarking at Lisbon, and that his sole object should be immediate and close pursuit, that he abandoned his wounded at Coimbra, with little or no protection, and advanced, without taking the precaution to form and establish magazines. On his arrival at Torres Vedras, after reconnoitring the British line, he found their position to be impregnable, and here the error he had committed, in making so incautious an advance, became manifest. These lines, strong by nature, and greatly improved by art, extended to a distance of 35 miles, flanked, on one side, by the sea, and on the other by the Tagus. The British army consisted of 30,000 efficient troops; besides 25,000 Portuguese regulars, 40,000 militia, and about 10,000 Spaniards. This army was divided into four divisions, and each division occupied one of the four passes of the mountains. The French force, when they reached the vicinity of Torres Vedras, could not consist of more than 60,000 men, harassed by fatigue, straitened for provisions, and without magazines in their rear; and when the relative strength and situation of the two armies was known in England, the destruction of the enemy was regarded as inevitable. Massena, how-

* Buonaparte was evidently preparing to make a more powerful effort to put an end to the war than had ever been made since he himself advanced into Spain; Massena was dispatched from Paris to put himself at the head of an army, composed of the divisions of Soult and Ney, and of large reinforcements brought from France, as well as from various parts of the Peninsula. In the beginning of July the hostile armies were posted as follows: a small French corps was stationed before Badajoz, watched by the Spanish army of Romana, consisting of 9000 men, and by General Hill, with a British force, amounting to about 5000. The grand French army, under Massena, was posted before Ciudad Rodrigo, which fortress he determined to take before he advanced further into Portugal. The head-quarters of the English army were in front of Celerico. Lord Wellington's army was formed into five divisions of which the first, under General Spencer, was at Celerico; the second, under General Hill, at Portalegra; the third, commanded by General Cole, was cantoned at Garda; the fourth, under General Picton, was at Pinhel; and the light division, under General Crawford, including two regiments of Portuguese cacadores or marksmen, was advanced close to the French army at Ciudad Rodrigo. Each division had attached to it some Portuguese regiments, with one or more English officers in them, and by whose efforts they had been brought into such excellent order and discipline, that it was reasonably expected they would, in the hour of trial, not disgrace their companions in the field.

† General Junot made also an unintentional acknowledgment of the gallant conduct of the Portuguese: Lord Wellington, he said, had practised a ruse de guerre, and deceived his enemy by dressing Englishmen in Portuguese uniforms. This day, the operations of the French army were directed by Marshal Massena, whose troops actually engaged amounted to 25,000 men; of this force, 286 were taken prisoners, including General Simon, three Colonels, and 33 officers; 2000 French troops were left dead on the field, and the number of wounded was in equal proportion. The loss of the English amounted to 197 killed, 493 wounded, and 31 prisoners; and that of the Portuguese to 90 killed, 512 wounded, and 50 prisoners.

ever,

ever, kept his position in front of Torres Vedras, till the 14th of November, when he marched for Santarem. On the morning of the following day, the allied army broke up, and followed the march of the enemy, hoping that the time for his destruction had now arrived; but, on examining his position at Santarem, it was not judged advisable to make an attack. Lord Wellington therefore contented himself with fixing his head-quarters at Cartaxo, about ten miles nearer Lisbon; and, in these positions, the two armies remained at the close of the year.

Parliament assembled on the 23d of January; and the opening speech, which was read by commission, turned principally upon the peace concluded between Austria and France; the disastrous expedition to Walcheren; the precarious state of our relations with Sweden; and the necessity of affording further assistance to Spain and Portugal. The debates on the address, which related chiefly to the conduct of the war in Spain, were followed by votes of thanks to Lord Wellington and his army, for the skill and gallantry displayed in the battle of Talavera: and these discussions were succeeded by a motion by Lord Portchester, for an inquiry into the policy and conduct of the late expedition to Walcheren. His Lordship moved for the appointment of a committee—not a select and secret committee, he said, before whom garbled extracts might be laid by ministers themselves, in order to produce a partial decision, but a committee of the whole House, by which oral evidence might be examined at the bar. This motion was opposed by ministers; but, on a division, there appeared, for the motion, 198; against it, 186. On the 1st of February, the day before the investigation commenced, Mr. Yorke gave notice that he should, during the inquiry, enforce the standing order of the House, for the exclusion of strangers. Mr. Sheridan deprecated the idea of proceeding in an investigation, in which the nation was so deeply interested, with closed doors, and asked, whether it could be endured that the people should be kept in complete ignorance of what Parliament was doing at one of the most awful moments of its existence. A majority, of members, however, 166 to 80, decided, that the standing order for the exclusion of strangers, should remain unaltered.* Amongst the papers laid before Parliament, was a "copy of the

* On the 19th of February, while the investigation into the Scheldt expedition was proceeding in the House, with closed doors, Mr. Yorke complained of a breach of privilege. His conduct in that assembly, he said, had been made the subject of discussion, in a speaking club, called, the British Forum, and their hand-bills, stuck upon all the walls of the city, stated, that, "after an interesting discussion, it was unanimously decided, that the enforcement of the standing order, by shutting out strangers from the gallery of the House of Commons, ought to be considered as an insidious and ill-timed attack upon the liberty of the press, as tending to aggravate the discontents of the people, and to render their representatives objects of jealous suspicion." The same hand-bill proposed a question for the next night's meeting, couched in these terms—"Which was the greatest outrage upon public feeling, Mr. Yorke's enforcement of the standing orders, or Mr. Windham's recent attack upon the liberty of the press?" This Mr. Yorke complained of as a gross violation of the privileges of that House, and the printer of the hand-bill, was ordered to attend at the bar. The printer, after humbly begging pardon of the honourable House for his offence, stated, that John Gale Jones was the author of the obnoxious hand-bill. Mr. Jones, when summoned to the bar, acknowledged that he was the author of the paper in question, adding, that he had always considered it the privilege of every Englishman to animadvert on public measures, and the conduct of public men; but, on looking over the paper again, he found he had erred, and begged to express his contrition, and cast himself upon the mercy of the House. The speaker now put the question, that John Gale Jones has been guilty of a gross breach of the privileges of this House, which was carried unanimously; and, on the motion of Mr. Yorke, he was committed to Newgate. The printer having given up his author, was reprimanded and discharged. Though several of the members of the House of Commons had expressed their doubts of the policy of committing Mr. Gale Jones to Newgate, none of them had denied or doubted the power of the House to punish a breach of privilege by imprisonment. This was reserved for Sir Francis Burdett, a man, who, as his friends insist, never suffers to pass unnoticed, or unemployed, an opportunity of defending the liberties, and securing the properties of the subject; or, as his enemies assert, of shaking the foundations of government, and inspiring dissatisfaction and discontent among the people. On the day when the committal took place, Sir Francis was confined to his house by indisposition; but as soon as possible after his return to his Parliamentary duty, he moved for the liberation of the prisoner of privilege, grounding his motion on an assumption that the House of Commons had exerted a power which the constitution did not confer upon them, and of which no precedent could be found, except in the worst periods of our history. The motion was made by Sir Francis Burdett, on the 12th of March, and in the speech delivered on that occasion, great research and knowledge of the law and practise of Parliament, were displayed. The honourable baronet, at the conclusion of his speech, moved, that John Gale Jones should be discharged; which motion was resisted by both sides of the House, and negatived by 153 against 14. The speech delivered on this occasion, Sir Francis Burdett published in a periodical paper, of the 24th of the same month, with a letter prefixed, addressed to his constituents. In consequence of this publication, it was moved by Mr. Lethbridge, and decided by a majority of the House of Commons, that Sir Francis Burdett had been guilty of publishing a scandalous and libellous paper, reflecting upon the just rights and privileges of that honourable House, for which offence, he was ordered to be taken into custody by the Serjeant at Arms, and committed to the Tower. This motion for commitment, which was made by Sir Robert Salisbury, was carried, after a long and animated debate, by a majority of 190 to 152 voices. The division did not take place till seven o'clock on the morning of Friday, the 6th of April; and, at half-past eight, the same morning, the Speaker signed the warrant, and delivered it to Mr. Colman, the Serjeant at Arms, with a direction to execute it before ten o'clock, that he might not have to convey his prisoner to the Tower through the streets of London in the middle of the day. Owing to the absence of Sir Francis from town, the Serjeant at Arms did not see him till the afternoon of that day, when the baronet, who was then at his house, in Piccadilly, told him that he intended to write to the Speaker, and that he should be ready to receive him the next morning, at eleven o'clock. The Serjeant at Arms then retired, and reported to the Speaker the steps that had been taken; when Mr. Abbot advised him to go back, and execute the warrant without further delay. In compliance with this advice, he returned to the house of Sir Francis, and informed him, that he had been reprimanded by the Speaker for the delay that had already taken place, and intimated, that he must accompany him to the Tower forthwith. To this Sir Francis Burdett replied, "If you bring an overwhelming force I must submit; but I dare not, from my allegiance to the King, and my respect to the laws, yield a voluntary submission to the warrant you have just exhibited: it is illegal; and you must leave my house." Mr. Colman, feeling himself at a loss how to act, withdrew, and repaired to the office of the Secretary of State. On the evening of the day on which the House of Commons directed the Speaker to issue his warrant for the apprehension and commitment of Sir Francis Burdett, the populace began to collect before his house in Piccadilly. On Saturday, in the afternoon, the concourse of people was so great, and the resistance to the execution of the warrant so highly probable, that ministers thought proper to call out all the military who were in London, and sent orders to several regiments, who were within a day's march, to proceed to the metropolis with all possible dispatch. The populace, who were before the baronet's house, compelled all the passengers on horseback, or in carriages, to pull off their hats as they passed, and in the evening they paraded the neighbouring streets, calling for lights, breaking the windows of such houses as did not illuminate, and more particularly venting their fury on the houses of his Majesty's ministers, and of such members of the House of Commons, as had distinguished themselves by speaking in favour of the imprisonment of Sir Francis Burdett. A doubt now arose in the mind of the Serjeant at Arms, whether the warrant under which he acted, would authorise him to break open the baronet's doors, which, he had learnt, were strongly barricadoed; and the opinion of Sir Vicary Gibbs, the Attorney-General, to whom the question was submitted, tended rather to confirm than to remove his apprehensions: there was no precedent to govern his decision, the Attorney-General said, but reasoning from analogy, the tendency of his opinion was, that the door might be broken open for the purpose of executing the warrant; but if, in any conflict that might take place in consequence, death should ensue, the officer who executed the warrant, would stand justified or not, as the breaking the House might be deemed lawful or unlawful. On this opinion, vague and inconclusive as it was, the Serjeant at Arms was obliged to act, and a little before eleven o'clock on the morning of Monday, the 9th of April, Mr. Colman, accompanied by messengers, and police officers, and supported by a large military force, broke open the baronet's house. Mr. Colman, advancing to Sir Francis Burdett, and, at the same time, presenting his warrant, said, "You are my prisoner." "That," rejoined Sir Francis, "is not a legal instrument; and I tell you, distinctly, that I will not voluntarily submit to an unlawful order. I demand, in the King's name, and in the name of the laws, that you forthwith retire from my house."—"Then, Sir," said the Serjeant, "I must call assistance, and force you to yield." The constables now laid hold on Sir Francis; Mr. Jones Burdett, and Mr. Roger O'Connor, who were in the room, immediately took him by the arm; but the peace officers closed on all three, and drew them down stairs. Sir Francis was then conducted to the coach, which, preceded and guarded by a large body of cavalry, conveyed him to the Tower. At the time that the Serjeant at Arms, and his attendants, broke into the house of Sir Francis Burdett, very few people were collected in Piccadilly, but the report of his seizure spread rapidly through every part of the metropolis; and before the coach, which, to avoid going through the city had taken a circuitous route, arrived at Tower Hill, the multitude in that quarter was immense. As soon as they perceived the carriage in which he was conveyed, their heads were instantly uncovered, and the air rang with acclamations in favour of the man whom they regarded as suffering in the cause of the liberties of his country. No attack was made upon the military till they began to return; but scarcely had they entered East Cheap, when they were assailed in the rear by a shower of stones the Earl of Chatham's statement of his proceedings;" dated the 15th of October, 1809, presented to the King on the 14th of February, 1810. The tenor of the narrative was to impute blame to the naval part of the expedition, and his Lordship represented its failure to have arisen, "either from insufficient arrangements on the part of the Admiral, Sir Richard Strachan, or from unavoidable difficulties, inherent in the nature of the expedition itself, which, being entirely of a naval nature, did not come within his province." The presenting of such a document to the sovereign by a military commander, without the intervention of any responsible minister, and without the knowledge of the accused party, was deprecated as a clandestine and unconstitutional attempt to poison the royal ear; and a motion made by Mr. Whitbread for an address to his Majesty, praying that copies of all papers submitted to him by the Earl of Chatham, at any time, concerning the expedition to the Scheldt, might be laid before that House, was carried in opposition to ministers by a majority of seven voices. This proceeding was followed by a vote of censure, proposed by Mr. Whitbread, and amended by Mr. Canning, in which Lord Chatham was pronounced highly reprehensible for the communication made to his Majesty; and his Lordship, in order to avoid an address to the King, praying for his removal from his Majesty's councils, resigned his office of master-general of the ordnance. The examination of evidence upon the Walcheren expedition occupied the House from the 2d of February to the 26th of March. Lord Porchester then moved two series of resolutions, to the effect, that the expedition was undertaken under circumstances which afforded no rational hope of adequate success, and at the precise season of the year when the disease, which had proved so fatal, was known to be most prevalent; that the advisers of that ill-judged enterprise were therefore highly reprehensible for the calamities with which its failure had been attended; and that their conduct, in delaying the evacuation of Walcheren, called for the severest censure. After four nights' debate, there appeared, for Lord Porchester's resolutions 227, and against them, 275 voices. The House next decided upon an amendment of General Crawford's, purporting, that though the House considered with regret the lives which had been lost, it was of opinion that his Majesty's ministers had proceeded upon good grounds in undertaking the expedition; which amendment was carried by a majority of 40 voices. The second set of resolutions, censuring ministers for delaying the evacuation of Walcheren, was negatived by 275 against 224; and a resolution, approving their conduct for retaining the island till the time it was abandoned, was carried by 255 against 232.

On the 16th of May the budget was brought forward, and the supplies voted for the year amounted to 52,185,000*l.* of which the proportion for Ireland was 6,106,000*l.* The ways and means, without the imposition of any new taxes, were estimated at a surplus of 141,202 over the demand, including, however, a loan of eight millions, which was borrowed at 4*l.* 4s. 3¼d. per cent; upwards of fifteen shillings per cent below the rate of legal interest.

With a view to economical reform, Mr. Bankes moved, that the act for suspending the granting of offices in reversion should be made perpetual; and a bill for this purpose passed the House of Commons almost without opposition. When this bill reached the Upper House it was thrown out at its second reading by a large majority. Mr. Bankes, finding, as he said, that there was a determined principle to oppose the bill in its present shape, introduced a second bill for a limited period; but this attempted compromise proved ineffectual, and the second bill was, in like manner, rejected by the Peers.*

Mr. Brand, on the 21st of May, moved for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the state of the representation of the people in Parliament; which motion stones and mud. For a considerable time the soldiers endured this attack with coolness and patience; but at length, finding the mob grow more daring, they fired several shots, by which, unfortunately, eight persons were wounded, two of them mortally.

The letter which Sir Francis Burdett had addressed to the Speaker, on Friday evening, was communicated to the House of Commons on Monday, and produced an unanimous resolution, "That the letter of Sir Francis Burdett to the Speaker is a high and flagrant breach of privilege." In this letter the baronet declared, that his duty to his King, and to his constituents, would not allow him voluntarily to obey the act of any set of men, who, contrary to the laws, assume the sovereign power; and he professed his readiness to accept the meanest office that would vacate his seat to get out of an association, which had illegally usurped the whole power of the realm. Sir Francis Burdett was consoled under his imprisonment by the addresses from different parts of the kingdom, and by the petitions that were sent to the House for his liberation. The first place that petitioned was the city of Westminster; and the counties of Middlesex and Berkshire, as well as the livery of London, the borough of Southwark, and the towns of Rochester, Hull, Reading, Nottingham, and Sheffield followed their example. Though the warrant by which Sir Francis Burdett was committed to the Tower, directed that he should remain imprisoned during the pleasure of the House of Commons, yet it had always been customary to liberate persons thus committed when the prorogation of Parliament took place, and that period was anxiously expected by the friends of the baronet in the metropolis. Though his liberation, by the lapse of time, could not, in any respect, be considered a triumph, it was determined to celebrate the day, and preparations were made to conduct him in great state from the Tower to his House in Piccadilly. Early in the morning of the 21st of June, all the streets through which the procession was to pass, were crowded with those who meant either to witness or to join in the splendid pageant. The hour at which it was known that Parliament would be prorogued was looked for with intense anxiety, and the most effectual methods had been taken to communicate the notice from Westminster-Hall to the Tower. The expected intelligence at last arrived; Parliament was prorogued, and Sir Francis Burdett was free. The immense multitudes on Tower-Hill pressed forward to catch the first glimpse of the popular favourite. Several minutes elapsed after the prorogation had been made known to the governor of the Tower, but the baronet did not appear. At length, after long and anxious expectation, it was announced by a speaking-trumpet, from the battlements of the fortress, that "Sir Francis Burdett left the Tower by water at half-past three o'clock." His friends were, for some time, incredulous, and it was suspected that it was meant to detain him; but they soon became convinced that he had crossed the river, and was probably at that time far advanced on the road to his country-house at Wimbledon. Discontent and chagrin began to appear among the multitude: they had been led to understand that the procession was planned and arranged with the knowledge and approbation of Sir Francis Burdett, and no intimation had been given that he had changed his mind. The explanation given by Sir Francis of this part of his conduct was by no means satisfactory; for if, as he stated to the committee that waited upon him, he apprehended mischief, he ought not to have countenanced the procession in the first instance; and as to the necessity of an expression of the public sentiment, no such necessity existed, the public having already sufficiently expressed their feelings and views of his imprisonment. The liberation of Mr. John Gale Jones from Newgate, took place at the same time that Sir Francis Burdett was discharged from the Tower; and Mr. Jones arrived in sufficient time at Tower-Hill to occupy the principal place in the procession, on its return into Westminster.

Sir Francis Burdett commenced actions against the Speaker of the House of Commons, for issuing the warrant for his arrest and imprisonment; against the serjeant-at-arms, for executing the warrant generally, and for breaking open the outer-door of his house in its execution; and against Earl Moira, the governor of the Tower, for illegal imprisonment. These actions the House of Commons ordered the Attorney General to defend. The plea was, that the warrant, being issued by the authority of the House of Commons, was a legal instrument, and that therefore the arrest and imprisonment were legal. This plea, as might have been foreseen, was admitted; and the privileges of Parliament were allowed by the Judges of the Court of King's Bench, not to be cognizable in a court of law, but to be part of the laws of the land. Thus, the attempt of Sir Francis Burdett to overthrow this branch of the privilege of Parliament, served to confirm those privileges, and gave to the claims of the House of Commons a solemn judicial recognition.

* A subject of considerable importance to the community, was brought under the consideration of Parliament, by Mr. Horner, who, on the 1st of February, moved for a variety of accounts and returns respecting the present state of the circulating medium, and the trade in bullion. On the production of these papers, a committee was appointed for the purpose of inquiry into the present high price of bullion, and the consequent effect on the value of the paper currency; but this inquiry opened so wide a field of investigation, that it was not till the eve of the prorogation of Parliament that the report of the committee could be submitted to the House. The bullion committee were of opinion, that the evils, into the causes of which they were commissioned to inquire, were to be attributed to an excessive issue of Bank of England paper; and it was stated in their report, that "a general rise of all prices, a rise in the market price of gold, and a fall in the foreign exchanges, will be the effect of an undue quantity of circulating medium in a country which has adopted a currency not exportable to other countries, or convertible at will into a coin that is convertible." But though the Bank of England notes were in reality at a discount, that discount, in the judment of the committee, did not arise from want of credit, or confidence in the funds, and stability in the bank, but merely from over issue. And it was stated, that "no sufficient remedy for the present evil, or security for the motion was rejected by a large majority. The frequently agitated question of Catholic emancipation was also brought forward in both Houses; and motions for the removal of the disabilities under which his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects labour, made by the Earl of Donoughmore and Mr. Grattan, were rejected both in the Lords and Commons by considerable majorities.

On the 13th of June, when the session was drawing nigh to a close, Earl Grey submitted to the consideration of the House of Peers a motion on the state of the nation; which was rejected by 134 against 72.—This was the last subject of importance that engaged the attention of Parliament; and on the 21st of June the two Houses were prorogued.*

In January, this year, the Dutch settlement of Amboyna, with its dependencies, was carried by a coup de main, by an expedition under Captain Tucker, who obtained a rich booty. Soon afterwards, the islands of Guadaloupe,† St. Martin's, and Eustatius also, surrendered to the British arms. The island of Bourbon and the Mauritius, or the Isle of France, had long served to afford shelter and protection to a large number of French privateers, which scoured the seas in the track of the East India shipping, and had captured vessels of that description to an enormous amount. In the hopes of regaining this booty, and for the purpose of rooting out the nest of privateers which infested these seas, expeditions were planned, first against the Isle of Bourbon, and afterwards against the Isle of France. A force was collected, consisting of 2,500 Europeans, and 2000 native troops, who were afterwards joined by 1000 men from the island of Rodriguez, under Lieutenant-Colonel Keating, to whom the command of the expedition against the Isle of Bourbon was confided. By the co-operation of the naval part of the expedition, under Commodore Rowley, the destruction of the French batteries and guns at St. Paul's took place in the month of September, 1809; and dispositions having been made for an attack on St. Dennis, a herald presented himself with an offer from the governor, Colonel St. Susanne, to capitulate, which proposal was readily acquiesced in, and the whole island passed under the sway of the British sceptre. A body of troops from the British settlements in India and the Cape of Good Hope, amounting to about 10,000, destined for the reduction of the Isle of France, arrived at the place of rendezvous on the 21st of November, 1810. This army was commanded by Major-General John Abercrombie, and the whole fleet under Admiral Bertie, including transports and ships of war, amounted to seventy-sail. On the 29th of November, the troops effected a landing under cover of the fire-ships, and on the 2d of December, prepared for attacking the forts; but on the day following, General de Caen, the French governor, proposed to capitulate, on condition that the troops should return to France without being considered as prisoners of war. These terms it was thought advisable to allow, and on the same day the capitulation was signed, by which the Isle of France, an immense quantity of stores and valuable merchandise, five large frigates, some smaller ships of war, and 28 merchantmen, with two captured British East Indiamen, were surrendered to his Majesty's arms.

Towards the close of the year, a domestic event occurred which suspended the royal functions, and plunged the country into great distress and embarrassment. The Princess Amelia, the youngest and favourite daughter of the King, after a painful and protracted illness, died on the 2d of November. The effect which this produced on the mental health of her royal father, was of the most melancholy nature.‡ Some days before the indisposition of the King, a proclamation had been issued, stating it to be the royal pleasure that Parliament should not assemble till the month of December; but the usual commission not being prepared, the meeting of Parliament took place on the 1st of November, the period to which, by a former commission, it had been prorogued.§

The mildness of the symptoms assumed by his Majesty's complaint, at the commencement of his present illness, induced a hope that the malady would not be of long continuance;‖ and, when Parliament again assembled on the 15th of November, ministers announced that the medical attendants of his Majesty were unanimously of opinion that his health was in a state of progressive improvement, and that they continued to express the most flattering and confident hopes that he would, in a very short space of time, be enabled to resume the personal exercise of the royal functions. On the faith of these representations, the two houses, after some debate, consented to a second adjournment till the 29th of November. On that day, ministers again moved and carried a further adjournment till the 13th of December.

future, could be pointed out, except the repeal of the law which suspends the cash payments of the Bank of England." To effect so important a change, the committee was aware that some difficulties must be encountered; but all hazards to the stability of the bank, and all injury to public credit, might be obviated, by restricting cash payments for two years from the present time, and by intrusting to the bank itself the charge of conducting and completing the operation.

* On the 4th of June, died the Right Honourable William Windham, a man whose name, in the history of literature and of politics, will be joined with those of Burke, Johnson, Pitt, and Fox. His death, which was occasioned by an operation for the removal of an indolent encysted tumour, took place, in the 61st year of his age. No man occupied a more elevated situation in the estimation of all parties, for honour, integrity, and patriotism, than Mr. Windham; but there was a certain tortuousness in his political course, which gave to his conduct an air of eccentricity; and his great talents were, on some occasions, applied to the purpose of advocating established abuses, even at the expense of humanity. As an official and party man, from a chivalry of sentiment inseparable from his nature, he occasionally displayed a dissonance of opinion from those with whom he acted, but his intentions were always pure; he was not made to belong to any set or party of men; he moved in an orbit of his own; and was never to be diverted from his purpose by any considerations either of fear or favour. As an orator, he was simple, eloquent, prompt, and graceful. As a statesman, he entertained a most profound veneration for the constitution of his country; and even his faults were not of an ordinary or grovelling kind. He aimed not at the attainment of transient popularity, but aspired to a lasting and imperishable reputation; and his sovereign embalmed his memory with this high eulogium—"Windham was a genuine patriot, and a truly honest man."

† A few weeks before the fall of Guadaloupe, two French frigates, of 48 guns each, with two vessels armed en flute, carrying troops and stores for the succour of that island, were met at sea by the Junon frigate, Captain Shortland, about 150 miles from their destination. Captain Shortland having been decoyed into a situation which compelled him either to fight or to surrender, determined to encounter the enemy, while a brig that was in company effected her escape. The two frigates lay, one on each side of the Junon, while one of the smaller vessels passed her bowsprit on the larboard, and the other on her starboard quarters. In this situation, they opened a most destructive fire upon their victim from all sides, the muskets of the enemy's troops being particularly galling. Captain Shortland soon perceived that his only hope of success depended upon an effort to board one of the frigates; but the party ordered upon this service were almost all cut off, by a general volley directed against them by the troops. After the battle had raged for some time, the enemy, in their turn, attempted to board, but they were three times repulsed, and it was not till after an action of an hour and a quarter that the Junon struck her colours. In this unequal conflict 90 of the French seamen were killed and wounded, and the vessel was reduced to so complete a wreck that the next day she was set on fire and destroyed. Captain Shortland, with a pike in his hand, headed his men till the last moment, when a langridge shot laid him senseless on the deck, and terminated his heroic career.

‡ It has been stated, that when the Princess Amelia felt that her end was fast approaching, she ordered a ring to be made, inclosing a lock of her hair, and inscribed with the words—"Remember me." This token of her dying affection she silently placed upon the finger of her royal father at his next visit to her chamber. Her own departure was so near that she never knew the fatal consequences. The King, who felt all that this charge imported, retired from her apartment extremely agitated, and when the dissolution of his beloved child actually took place, his mind was no longer in a state to derive consolation from the reflection that death had terminated her sufferings.

§ The only case in history exactly similar to that which now presented itself was the precedent of 1788-9; Parliament had that year been prorogued to the 20th of November, and as the regular commission for its further intended prorogation had not been signed by the King, it necessarily met on that day. The Peers and the Commons each remained in their separate chambers, and after the state of his Majesty's mental health had been explained, an adjournment for fifteen days was unanimously resolved upon. This precedent was strictly followed upon the present melancholy occasion; and letters were transmitted to the members of the respective houses, requiring their attendance on Thursday the 15th of November.

‖ Sir Henry Halford, and Drs. Heberden and Baillie, were the physicians first called in. By them the bulletins were signed, which were regularly issued, at first once, and afterwards twice a day, from the 29th of October to the 4th of November, when the signature of Dr. Reynolds, for the first time, appeared. On the 9th day of that month, Dr. Willis was called in; a circumstance from which it was inferred that his Majesty's disorder had assumed a more decided and obstinate character than was originally contemplated.

BAPIN'S

HISTORY OF ENGLAND

cember. During this period, the disease of his Majesty by no means abated, and it was generally understood that the malady threatened a long and tedious endurance. When, therefore, Parliament met for the fourth time, ministers were under the necessity of proposing that the physicians should be examined by a committee, appointed by each house; and of explicitly stating, that if the report should not hold out a prospect of speedy recovery, they would then propose measures to supply the defect in the royal authority. The physicians, in the examination that took place, described his Majesty's disorder to be a derangement of mind, closely allied to delirium, and occasionally falling into it; and the result of the inquiry established the fact, that his Majesty was not only at this time totally incapable of performing the high functions of his royal office, but that his recovery would be slow and remote. Under these circumstances, all idea of further adjournment was at an end, and ministers found it absolutely necessary to proceed towards the appointment of a regency. The session not having been opened by the royal authority, could not be constitutionally regarded as the Parliament of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, but merely as a convention of the Lords and Commons; and in opening the business in the House of Commons, on the 20th of December, Mr. Perceval moved three distinct propositions, declaratory of the present incapacity of the King; of the competency of the two Houses of Parliament to supply the defect; and of the necessity of passing a bill for maintaining entire the constitutional authority of the King. The first of these resolutions passed unanimously; the second, with the single negative of Sir Francis Burdett, who denied that all the estates of this realm were "lawfully, fully, and freely represented in Parliament." On the third resolution, Mr. Ponsonby moved an amendment, to the effect that an address should be presented to the Prince of Wales, praying him to take upon himself the office of Regent. On this amendment, long and animated debates took place, but as Lord Grenville and his friends adhered to the doctrines which they had maintained and acted upon with Mr. Pitt on a former occasion, the opposition were out-voted in the Commons by a majority of 112, and in the Lords by 26 voices. After these resolutions, had received the sanction of the three estates of the realm (the Lords spiritual, and temporal, and the Commons) another series of resolutions* was brought forward by Mr. Perceval, expressive of the expediency of vesting the royal authority in the Prince of Wales, as "Regent of the Kingdom," subject to certain restrictions and limitations enumerated in these resolutions. The opposition made a formidable stand against the general principle of restrictions, as well as against the particular limitations of the royal power, which ministers proposed to impose upon the Regent; in many of the divisions they were joined by Mr. Canning and Lord Castlereagh, and their respective friends, as well as by other members, who usually voted with ministers, and the existing government carried some of their motions by very small majorities. The proposed exception to the grant of Peerages in favour of military officers, was opposed by Lord Grenville, and in this, as in the other restrictions, the precedent of 1788-9 was ultimately adhered to. As soon as Parliament had come to the determination to proceed by bill and not by address, and Mr. Perceval had sketched the plan of his proposed restrictions, he addressed a letter to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, communicating to him his intentions. The Prince, in reply, simply and briefly referred Mr. Perceval to the letter, which, on a similar occasion, he had sent to Mr. Pitt, and in which he had protested against the proposed plan of restricted regency.

His Royal Highness, however, agreed to accept the high and important trust, even though fettered and limited in such a manner as, in his apprehension, might prevent him from fulfilling its duties so completely and beneficially to the nation as he could wish. In these views the royal brothers of the Prince fully concurred, and in a species of extra-official note to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, entered their protest against a proceeding, which they considered "perfectly unconstitutional and as contrary to and subversive of the principles which seated their family upon the throne of this realm."†

This year was distinguished by a variety of miscellaneous events upon the Continent, each of which, respectively, had a considerable influence upon the general system. Amongst these may be particularly mentioned, the sudden and suspicious death of the crown Prince of Sweden, and the consequent election of Marshal Bernadotte to that elevated station;‡ the marriage of

* I. That for the purpose of providing for the exercise of the royal authority, during the continuance of his Majesty's illness, in such manner, and to such extent, as the present circumstances, and the urgent concerns of the nation appear to require, it is expedient that his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, being resident within the realm, shall be empowered to exercise and to administer the royal authority, according to the laws and constitution of Great Britain, in the name and on behalf of his Majesty, and under the style and title of Regent of the kingdom; and to use, execute, and perform, in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, all authorities, prerogatives, acts of government, and administration of the same, that belong to the King of this realm, to use, execute, and perform, according to the law thereof, subject to such limitations and exceptions as shall be provided.

II. That the powers to be given to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, shall not extend to the granting of any rank or dignity of the Peerage of the realm to any person whatever, except to—(persons who have rendered eminent services to the country by sea or land).

III. That the said power shall not extend to the granting of any office whatever in reversion, or to the granting of any office, salary, or pension, for other terms than during his Majesty's pleasure, except such offices as are by law required to be granted for life, or during good behaviour.

IV. That the said power shall not extend to the granting of any part of his Majesty's real and personal estate, except as far as relates to the renewal of leases.

V. That the care of his Majesty's royal person, during the continuance of his Majesty's illness, shall be committed to the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty; and that her Majesty shall have the power to remove from, and to nominate and appoint such persons as she shall think proper, to the several offices in his Majesty's household; and to dispose, order, and manage, all other matters and things relating to the care of his Majesty's royal person, during the time aforesaid; and that, for the better enabling her Majesty to discharge this important task, it is also expedient that a council shall be appointed, to advise and assist her Majesty in the several matters aforesaid; and with power, from time to time, as they may see cause, to examine, upon oath, the physicians and others attending his Majesty's person, touching the state of his Majesty's health, and all other matters relating thereto.

The Regency bill, of which the above may be considered as an official abstract, enacted, that the restriction imposed on the executive power as exercised by the Prince Regent, should cease on the 1st of February, 1812.

† Parliament was opened by commission under the great seal, on the 15th of January, 1811. It was well known that the political attachments and principles of the Prince Regent lay all on the side of Earl Grey and Lord Grenville; and it was naturally expected that the existing administration would be dissolved, and the members who now occupied the opposition benches, taken into power; but the period for the installation was fast approaching, and no arrangements for a new ministry had taken place. The malady of the King, after undergoing frequent and great variations, assumed a much more mild and favourable form, and the physicians again pronounced his Majesty's complete recovery as not far distant. This circumstance, combined with others, determined the Prince to retain the present ministers. This determination he communicated to Mr. Perceval, in a note, dated the 4th of February: at the same time explicitly and candidly stating to him, that the irresistible impulse of filial duty and affection to his beloved and afflicted father, made him unwilling to do a single act which might retard his recovery; and that this consideration alone had dictated the decision now communicated to Mr. Perceval. He added, that it would not be one of the least blessings that would result from the restoration of his Majesty to health and to the personal exercise of his royal functions, that it would rescue the Regency from a situation of unexampled embarrassment, and put an end to a state of affairs, ill calculated, he feared, to sustain the interests of the united kingdom in this awful and perilous crisis, and most difficult to be reconciled to the genuine principles of the British constitution.

‡ Charles Augustus, Prince of Augustenburg, who had, on the 24th of January, been elected to the dignity of Crown Prince of Sweden, died suddenly, on the 29th of May, while he was reviewing some regiments of cavalry on Bonorp Heath; and his death was preceded and accompanied by circumstances, which excited in the minds of the populace, a strong and general suspicion, that he had been poisoned. In other times, his death might have appeared perfectly natural; but suspicions fixed upon the two families of Ferseh and Piper, who were thought to be jealous of his popularity, and apprehensive that his elevation to the throne would destroy that influence which they had long enjoyed in the government. The interval which of Buonaparte, to the Archduchess Maria Louisa, of Austria;* the abdication of Louis Buonaparte, in favour of his son, and the annexation of Holland, and the Hanse Towns to France;† the death of the Queen of Prussia; ‡ and the junction of Hanover with the kingdom of Westphalia.—Nor was the succeeding year (1811) destitute of events calculated to render this portion of history interesting to the present, and memorable in future ages. The navy of England, indeed, finding no adequate antagonist, was obliged to satisfy itself with such minor exploits as occasionally presented themselves, but in which the skill and superiority of the Lords of the ocean were always sufficiently conspicuous.§ Lord Minto, however, the Governor-General of India, under which elapsed between the death of the Prince and his interment, gave time for suspicion to spread; and when the funeral procession arrived at Stockholm, on the 20th of June, the agitation had increased to so alarming a degree, that the populace fell upon Count Axel Fersen, who led the procession in his carriage and six, and actually tore him to pieces. To calm this dreadful ferment, a proclamation was issued, and measures were adopted to remove the suspicions of the people, by an open judicial inquiry into the cause of the death of their favourite. A reward of 20,000 rix dollars, was also offered to any person who would give such evidence, touching the supposed murder, as would convict the offender, whatever might be his rank or description. The result of the examination was, that the Crown Prince had died a natural death, by apoplexy; and public tranquillity being in a few days restored, the attention of the inhabitants of Sweden, as well as of a great part of Europe, was fixed on the choice that was about to be made of his successor. On the 15th of August, the four estates of Sweden were assembled at Orebro, for the purpose of electing a Crown Prince, or heir-apparent to the Swedish throne. The four candidates who aspired to this honour, were, Frederic VI. King of Denmark; the Prince of Oldenburg, son of Gustavus Adolphus, the late King; the Prince of Augustenburg, brother to the deceased Crown Prince; and the French Marshal Bernadotte, Prince of Ponte Corvo. Through the predominating influence of Buonaparte, Jean Baptiste Julian Bernadotte, Prince of Ponte Corvo, was elected; and from that moment, he may be considered as the efficient ruler of Sweden.—Adverse, however, to open and actual hostility with Great Britain, he continued for some time to permit the commercial intercourse to be carried on between the two countries; and when, in the month of December, war was declared against England, the Swedish declaration of war contained an almost explicit avowal that this resolution was taken at the instigation of Buonaparte.

* Marshal Berthier, was dispatched on a special mission to Vienna, to demand the Archduchess Maria Louisa in marriage. The Princess, in the excess of female vanity, exulting in the conquest of the subjugator of Europe, was easily won; and the council of Vienna moderated the Emperor's feelings of humility, by unveiling to him the future, and expatiating upon the advantages of the proposed alliance. The marriage ceremony, in which the Archduke Charles, as the proxy of Napoleon, received the hand of his august relative, was performed on the 11th of March, at Vienna, in the church of the Augustines, and in the presence of the Emperor and Empress of Austria. On the 13th, Maria Louisa, left Vienna, and arrived at Compeigne on the 27th, where she was met by Buonaparte. On the 1st of April, the civil ceremony of the celebration and ratification of the marriage, took place in the Hall of Mars, in the imperial chatean of St. Cloud; and on the following day, the religious ceremony was performed by the grand almoner and two assistant Bishops, in the Chapel of the Louvre.

† In the war waged by France against the commercial prosperity, and the maritime greatness, of England, it became peculiarly necessary that Holland should lend her cordial co-operation. The character and necessities of the Dutch operated powerfully against the project for the total exclusion of British commerce, and induced Napoleon to issue the most strict and peremptory orders to Louis to enforce his decrees with rigour. For a short time these orders were obeyed, but the wretchedness which every where presented itself, and the numerous and urgent petitions of the sufferers, so far prevailed in the mind of Louis over every consideration of state policy, that he threw open the Dutch ports, and repealed his decrees against commerce. This conduct was highly resented by Buonaparte; and Louis at length, finding that all his endeavours and sacrifices on behalf of the Dutch nation were unavailing, abdicated his throne in favour of his eldest son, Louis Napoleon. This act of abdication, which bore date the 1st of July, not having been previously concerted with Buonaparte, was declared invalid; and on the 9th day of the same month an imperial decree was issued from Paris, by which the kingdom of Holland was united to the French empire. The next act of usurpation consisted in the annexation of the Hanse Towns to France. "The orders published by the British consul in 1806 and 1807 had," it was said, "rent in pieces the public law of Europe, and created the necessity for the junction of the mouths of the Scheldt, the Meuse, the Rhine, the Ems, the Weser, and the Elbe, to the French empire."

‡ The Queen, of Prussia, whose high spirit had been broken by the disasters of her country, languished till the 19th of July, when she expired in the prime of life. The loss of a beloved consort, not less distinguished for her domestic virtues than for her personalcharms, almost overpowered the disconsolate monarch, and he was with difficulty prevailed upon to abandon a resolution which he had taken to quit the affairs of state, and to seek in retirement and seclusion a solace for his accumulated distresses. Absorbed in these feelings he saw, without emotion, the electorate of Hanover pass into the hands of Jerome Buonaparte, and become an integral part of the kingdom of Westphalia.

§ Early in March a small English squadron, under the command of Captain Hoste, consisting of the Amphion and Cerberus, each of 32 guns, and of the Active and Volage, the former of 38, and the latter of 22 guns, discovered off the island of Lissa, in the Italian seas, a French squadron of five frigates, one corvette, four brigs, two schooners, and two smaller vessels, commanded by Captain Duhordieu. On the approach of the English fleet, the enemy formed themselves into two divisions, and bore down under a press of sail, to carry into effect the British system of tactics, by breaking their adversary's line. This attempt having failed of success, the French commodore, who led the van in the favourite, of 44 guns, attempted to place the English squadron between two fires, but while he was manœuvring for this purpose, his ship approached too near the shore, and was driven on the rocks of Lissa. The enemy, undismayed by the fate of their commodore, persisted in the attempt to place the British between two fires, and the starboard division having passed under the stern of the British ships engaged them to leeward, while the larboard division tacked and remained to windward. Though the enemy displayed more than their accustomed skill on this occasion, and followed up that skill with a considerable share of activity, and bravery, yet they made no impression on the British squadron; but on the contrary, after the battle had raged about two hours, the two French frigates to the leeward struck their colours. Those who had attacked to the windward, seeing the fate of their companions, endeavoured to escape, but they were closely pursued, and one of them was compelled to surrender, leaving Captain Hoste in the possession of the Corona, of 44 guns, and the Bellona, of 32 guns. Besides these vessels, the Favourite, which had driven on the rocks, shortly after blew up, while the corvette and two frigates took shelter in the port of Lessina. At the time that the Flora, Captain Peridier, which was one of the frigates to leeward, struck her colours, the Amphion, to which she surrendered, was so closely engaged with the Bellona, that Captain Hoste could not spare a boat to take possession of his prize, and the Flora, availing herself of this circumstance, took an opportunity to re-hoist her colours, and dishonourably to sheer off. After this most gallant action, Captain Hoste had the gratification to find that the vanquished fleet had on board 500 troops for the purpose of garrisoning the island of Lissa, with every thing necessary for its fortification; and an additional share of splendour was shed round the glory of this enterprise by the entire defeat of the enemy's intention to possess himself of that island. The loss of the English amounted to 50 killed, and 150 wounded.

Another gallant service was performed in the Mediterranean sea by the Pomone, and Unité frigates, and the Scout sloop of war, under the command of Captain Barrie, in the destruction of three large vessels lying in Sagone bay, in the island of Corsica.

On the coast of Calabria a convoy of 22 sail were attacked and captured by his Majesty's ships, the Thames, Captain Napier, and the Cephalus, Captain Clifford, with 11 French gun-boats, and one armed felucca, without the loss of a single man. At Palinura, on the coast of Naples, a detachment of 200 under the command of Captain Darley, disembarked from on board the Thames and Impérieuse frigates, with 50 marines, commanded by Lieutenant Pipon, landed in the face of 900 of the enemy, and after destroying the batteries and cannon of the fort, captured and brought off six gun-boats, and 20 merchant vessels. The capture and destruction of an entire convoy in the Adriatic sea was effected by Captain Gordon, of the Active. And about the same time Captain Bourchier, of his Majesty's ship, the Hawke, succeeded, after a desperate engagement, in driving two of the enemy's brigs, and two luggers, with 15 of their convoy on shore on the coast of Normandy.

In August, at the mouth of the Gironde, Captain Ferris, of the Diana, and Captain Richardson, of the Semiramis, perceiving four sail of merchant vessels, under convoy of a national brig of war, within the shoals, and aware that no forcible attempt could be made to pass the river and carry the vessels with any prospect of success, hoisted French colours, and so completely did they deceive the enemy, that a pilot was sent out to conduct them into port. With this assistance, the Diana and the Semiramis anchored, after dark, near the batteries at the mouth of the Gironde, when Captain Ferris dispatched three boats from his vessel, which being seconded by four others from the Semiramis, proceeded up the river about the middle of the night of the 24th, and captured the convoy. In the morning the enemy's gun-boats were attacked and destroyed; and Captain Richardson, as though in contempt of their batteries, drove the armed brig on shore, and burnt her under the fire of their cannon.

A short time after the capture of the Isle of France, three French frigates, (the Renommée, Nereide, and Clorinde) full of troops, intended for the succour of that colony, were known to be in the Indian seas; and the Astræa, Phœbe, and Galatea frigates, with the Race Horse brig, were dispatched in quest of them. On the 19th of May, the enemy, who had put into Madagascar to water, was discovered off the coast of that island. After a chase of ten hours, the French frigates were brought to action, and for some time the battle raged with so much fury that one of the frigates on each side was completely disabled, and obliged to withdraw from the contest. The battle re-commenced by the Astrea pouring a destructive broadside into the French commodore's ship, La Renommée: instead of returning this fire, the commodore ordered his men to board the Astrea, but owing to the skilful manœuvres of the British Captain, and the gallant conduct of his crew, this attempt was completely frustrated. Night had now closed upon the conflicting squadrons, and the dismal gloom was only interrupted by the vivid flashes of the cannon, which served to impart a degree of awful sublimity to the surrounding scene. At length, after a most gallant resistance, the French commodore's ship struck her colours, and the Clorinde, finding under whose auspices and direction the conquest of the Isle of Bourbon and the Isle of France were achieved, had formed a plan for adding Java, the most important possession of the Dutch East India Company, to the British colonial empire.

A. D. 1811.] Batavia, the capital of this settlement, had long been the principal seat of the Dutch government of the east; and from this station the mother-country had, in the days of her independence and prosperity, derived great wealth and many commercial advantages. The paralyzing influence of French alliance had latterly diminished the importance of this colony, but it still served as a shelter and protection to the cruisers of the enemy, and interposed as a barrier in the way of the trade of the British East India Company between Hindostan and China. The enemy, aware of the intended attack, was indefatigable in his endeavours to protect and defend his only remaining colony in the east; and with this view, a force of 10,000 men was collected, and placed under the command of General Jansens. In March was embarked at Madras, a force consisting of the 14th, 59th, and 69th regiments of foot, four squadrons of the 22d dragoons, two squadrons of horse, and a party of foot artillery, with a considerable portion of native troops. This force was to be joined on its passage by the 78th regiment from Bengal, and the chief command of the expedition was vested in Sir Samuel Auchmuty. The magnitude of the preparations delayed the departure of the expedition till the approach of the Monsoons; but Lord Minto avoided the apprehended danger by judiciously profiting by the land winds, and striking from the south-west point of Sambhar to the coast of Java. On the 4th of August, the troops were debarked about 12 miles to the eastward of the city of Batavia.

The force of the enemy had taken up a strongly fortified position at Cornelis, and thither the British General determined to proceed without loss of time, having previously taken possession of Batavia, which surrendered to Colonel Gillespie without resistance. The enemy, before he evacuated the city, had set fire to several large store houses of public property, and had attempted to destroy the remainder; but many of the valuable granaries and store-houses of sugar, which had been laid open to the weather, in hopes that the rain might so far injure the stocks as to render them unfit for use, were happily preserved. Early in the morning of the 13th, Colonel Gillespie moved towards the enemy's cantonment at Weltevreede, which they abandoned on his approach, and took up a strong position about two miles in advance of their works at Cornelis. This fort, which was protected by an abatis, and defended by 3000 of the enemy's best troops, Colonel Gillespie carried at the point of the bayonet, and from thence advanced to the front of the lines at Cornelis. The enemy, greatly superior in numbers, was strongly intrenched between the river Jacatra and the Sloken canal, neither of which was fordable, and the position was shut up by a deep trench, strongly palisadoed: seven redoubts, and numerous batteries, mounted with heavy cannon, occupied the most commanding ground within the lines; and the fort of Cornelis, and the whole of the works, were defended by a numerous and well organized artillery.

By these works, it was thought, that the British army would be delayed, and their destruction might then be safely left to the operation of a climate the most pestilential in the world. Sir Samuel Auchmuty well understood the danger of delay, and the consequent necessity of promptitude of action. The season was too far advanced, the heat too intense, and his numbers insufficient, to admit of regular approaches; he therefore determined upon an assault, and for the purpose of disabling the principal redoubts of the enemy, batteries were erected, which continued to play upon their works till this object was fully accomplished. The moment had arrived for the general assault, and at the dawn of the 26th, this hazardous operation was undertaken. In this attack, as in the preliminary enterprises, the principal duty was assigned to Colonel Gillespie. General Jansens was in the redoubt when the assault commenced. Colonel Gillespie having possessed himself almost instantaneously of the bridge over the Sloken, attacked and carried one of the redoubts within the lines. Part of the Colonel's corps being now joined by a portion of the army which had attacked the enemy in front, the united force assailed and carried another of the redoubts. Similar success attended the corps under Colonel M'Leod, of the 69th regiment, who fell in the moment of victory, and four redoubts within the lines were now in the possession of the British. The front of the enemy was also routed, and their position at that point laid open. The only redoubts now possessed by the enemy, lay in his rear, and to those Colonel Gillespie, being joined by Colonel M'Leod, of the 59th regiment, directed his attention. Here the greater part of the enemy's artillery, surrounded and protected by their cavalry, was posted; the redoubts, however, were carried in the same heroic style as those in advance, their artillery was captured, and their cavalry compelled to fly. Soon after Cornelis surrendered; and in this engagement the whole of the hostile army was killed, taken, or dispersed. General Jansens, who had thrice rallied his retreating troops, escaped with difficulty from the field, followed only by a few cavalry. The loss of the enemy in these different actions was immense—about 1000 men were buried in the works; vast numbers were cut down in the retreat; the rivers were literally choaked with the bodies of the slain, and the adjacent huts and woods were filled with the wounded, most of whom afterwards died. Nearly 5000 prisoners were taken, among whom were three general officers and 36 field officers; and the number of artillery and field pieces, taken in this memorable campaign, amounted to upwards of 700. Twenty-seven native troops, and 114 British, killed, and 123 natives, and 610 British, wounded, was the price paid for the island of Java. As soon as these conquests were secured, a body of troops was embarked, under Rear-Admiral Stopford, and ordered to proceed to Samerang, where they were joined by Sir Samuel Auchmuty. General Jansens, who had retired to that town, answered a summons sent to him to surrender the island, by expressing a determination to persevere in his resistance; but, on the 12th of September, it was discovered that he had evacuated the place, and taken up a position on the road to Solo, the capital of the Soesoehoenam, or Autocrat. This position Colonel Gibbs was directed to attack on the 16th; but the allies and native troops of the enemy had no zeal in the service, and dreading the attack of men who had displayed such prodigies of valour at Cornelis, they fled at their approach, leaving the road finding herself completely overpowered, followed her example. In this action, which from its commencement to its close continued seven hours, and was four times renewed, the enemy lost upwards of 200 men killed and wounded, amongst the former of whom were the Captains of the Nereide and the Renommée. The loss of the British was also severe, and amounted to upwards of 100 killed and wounded, 60 of whom were on board the Galatea.

On the night of the 4th of December, the Saldanha frigate, of 32 guns, commanded by the Hon. Captain Pakenham, was lost off Lough Swilly, on the coast of Ireland, and every soul on board perished. On the 23d of the same month, his Majesty's ship the Hero, Captain Newman, of 74 guns, with a convoy of 120 sail of merchant-men under his protection, was overtaken by a dreadful gale in the German ocean, and driven on the Haak Sand off the Texel, where both ship and crew were engulphed in the watery abyss. Many of the convoy rode out the storm, but upwards of 20 of the number shared the deplorable fate of the Hero and her crew. On the night of the 24th of December, the St. George, of 98 guns, commanded by Admiral Reynolds, and the Defence, of 74 guns, Captain Atkins, after encountering severe storms in the Baltic, were stranded on the western coast of North Jutland. The Defence first took the ground, and in less than half an hour became a complete wreck, when the Captain and all her crew, six only excepted, perished. For some hours the St. George continued to brave the storm, and the most persevering exertions were made to afford her succour from the shore, but all proved unavailing. Of the whole crew, which amounted to nearly 800 men, 11 only succeeded in gaining the land; and when the last of them left the St. George, in the afternoon of the 25th, Admiral Reynolds and Captain Guion were stretched dead upon the quarter-deck, with at least 500 of the crew. At that time about 50 of the ship's company remained alive, and their piteous cries were heard for several hours, but during the night of the 26th the ship went to pieces, and at once extinguished their hopes and terminated their sufferings.

covered with the equipments which they had thrown away in their retreat. Early in the night, a flag of truce arrived from General Jansens, with an offer to surrender, and a negociation was immediately entered into, which terminated in a capitulation, by which the Dutch General and all his remaining troops surrendered prisoners of war. The overthrow of the Dutch empire in the east was thus completed; and, except in Europe, the British nation was left without an enemy or a rival.

Buonaparte's new wife, to whose "illustrious progeny" the people of France looked for a successor to the Napoleon throne, this year (April 2) brought forth a son. The joyous event, communicated by telegraphic messages to every part of France, was celebrated in Paris by rejoicings, illuminations, and public thanksgiving. The mistress of the world afforded a title to the heir-apparent, who, from the day of his birth, took the title of King of Rome.

After the passing of the act for investing the Prince of Wales with the powers requisite for exercising the office of Regent, his Royal Highness took the prescribed oaths before the privy council, and from that time became the representative of the sovereign. On the 12th of February, Parliament was opened with the usual formalities.* In the Lords, the Earl of Aberdeen moved the address, which was seconded by Lord Elliot, and carried without a division. In the Lower House, the address, moved by Mr. Milner, and seconded by Mr. Richard Wellesley, encountered no other opposition than that which might seem to be implied in a declaration made by Mr. Ponsonby, that in acquiescing in the address he should not be precluded from discussing any particular topic in the speech when the subject came before the House in a separate and detached form.† The increasing commercial distresses of the nation were now so seriously felt, that the attention of government was necessarily fixed upon them; and on the 1st of March, a committee of twenty-one members distinguished for their knowledge of commercial concerns, and nominated without any regard to political party, was appointed to take into consideration the present state of the commercial credit of the country, and to make their report thereon. On the 11th of March, the report of the committee was taken into consideration, and on the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a bill was introduced into Parliament and passed into a law, whereby the sum of 6,000,000*l.* was to be advanced to certain commissioners, for the assistance of such merchants as should apply for the same, on giving sufficient security for the re-payment of the money so advanced. It might naturally have been supposed that, in the midst of so much embarrassment and distress, the money voted by Parliament at the recommendation of the committee would have been eagerly sought after and soon exhausted; such was the case in 1793; the reverse, however, happened now, and the sums applied for were to a less amount than the provision made. Yet the commercial distresses continued to increase during the year, and displayed themselves by frightful lists of bankrupts in every gazette, amounting to an aggregate of which no former year in the annals of the country afforded a parallel.*

A degree of melioration in the discipline of the army, took place during the present session of Parliament. The practise of flogging in the army had frequently been a subject of animadversion both in and out of Parliament; but, though government had strenuously opposed the motions which had been made to abolish this punishment, when the mutiny bill came to be submitted to the House of Commons on the 14th of March, Mr. Manners Sutton proposed to introduce a clause by which a power should be given to courts-martial to substitute at their option the punishment of imprisonment for corporal punishments. To the admission of this humane provision no objection was made, and the mutiny bill, so amended, passed into a law.*

It was with no slight degree of surprise, that the country heard the intention announced by Lord Sidmouth, of introducing a bill into Parliament, to amend and explain the act of William and Mary, usually called

* The speech, which was delivered by commission in the name of the regent, expressed the most unfeigned sorrow on account of the calamity which had imposed upon his royal highness the duty of exercising the royal authority; the Prince Regent, at the same time, congratulated Parliament upon the success of his Majesty's arms, both by sea and land; and trusted that he would be enabled to continue to afford the most effectual assistance to the brave nations of the Peninsula. With regard to the United States of America, it was his earnest wish to bring the discussions with that country to an amicable termination, consistent with the honour of the crown and the maintenance of the maritime rights and interests of this kingdom; and he trusted to the zeal of Parliament for adequate supplies in order to bring the great contest in which the country was engaged to a happy issue.

† A proof of the manner in which the Prince Regent regarded the temporary authority with which he was vested, was afforded by a communication made to the House of Commons on the 21st of February, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, that his royal highness, on being informed that a motion was intended to be made for a provision for the royal household, declared that he would not add to the burthens of the people, by accepting of any addition to his public state as Regent of the United Kingdom. This subject was illustrated by Mr. Adam, who stated that the Regent had put into his hands the letter from Mr. Perceval, relating to the intended provision, accompanying it with written instructions, that, should any proposition for an establishment, or a grant from the privy purse, be made to the House, he should inform that assembly that his royal highness wished to discharge the duties of the temporary regency without increasing his establishment. In case, however, of such circumstances occurring as might lead to a permanent regency, he conceived that the question would then be opened anew to the consideration of his royal highness.

* The report of the Bullion Committee was brought under the consideration of the House of Commons on the 6th of May, by Mr. Horner, who moved a series of resolutions, grounded upon the report of the committee, and maintaining the same doctrines. It was hence contended, that the standard value of gold, as a measure of exchange, could not possibly fluctuate under any change of circumstances, though its real price was unquestionably subject to all the variations arising from the increase or diminution of the supply; that bank paper, measured by this standard, was depreciated; and that the consequence of this depreciation was, to render our exchanges with the continent unfavourable, to advance prices, to occasion immense losses to creditors, and materially to injure all monied incomes. Mr. Vansittart, who took the lead on the part of the practical statesmen, as they were designated, in opposition to the bullionists, moved by way of amendment, a number of counter resolutions to those proposed by Mr. Horner, in which it was declared, that bank notes were not depreciated; that the political and commercial relations of this country with foreign states were sufficient to account for the unfavourable state of the foreign exchange, and the high price of bullion; that it was highly important that the restrictions on cash payments at the bank should be removed whenever it was compatible with the public interest; but that, to fix a definite period earlier than that of six months after the conclusion of peace, which was already fixed, would be highly inexpedient and dangerous. These discussions occupied the House of Commons no less than seven nights, and issued in the rejection of the resolutions moved by Mr. Horner, and the adoption by a large majority of those presented by Mr. Vansittart. Before the session closed, however, a practical illustration was adduced by Lord King, that the question was not set at rest by this decision. His Lordship, in a notice sent to his tenants, reminded them, that by their leases, bearing date in the year 1802, they had agreed to pay their rents in good and lawful money of Great Britain, and informed them that in consequence of the late depreciation of paper money, he could no longer accept of bank notes at their nominal value in payment or satisfaction of those contracts. He therefore called upon them to pay their rents, either in guineas, or in equivalent weight in Portuguese gold coin, or in bank notes, sufficient to purchase, at the existing market price, the weight of as much standard gold as would discharge the rents. This notice had not attracted any degree of the public attention till Lord Stanhope brought the matter under consideration in the House of Lords. His Lordship thought this proceeding so unjust in itself, so much calculated to shake the credit of the currency of the country, and the example so infectious, and likely to be followed by the landlords throughout the kingdom, that in pursuance of what he considered a public duty, his Lordship introduced a bill into the House of Lords on the 27th of June, for preventing the current gold coin of the realm from being paid for more than its mint value, and for preventing bank notes from being received for any smaller sum than that for which they were issued. The fate of this bill was very extraordinary: on its first reading, ministers opposed it on the ground that such a measure was unnecessary, and might be mischievous; but on the second reading they had discovered their error, and the prorogation of Parliament was actually delayed beyond the appointed time to pass Lord Stanhope's bill into an act; and, at the close of the session, it became the law of the land.

† A measure, closely allied in principle to the new clause in the mutiny act, was brought into Parliament by Mr. Brougham, by whom leave was obtained to introduce a bill for the prevention of the enormities which still continued to be practised by captains of vessels and others, who, notwithstanding the legislative enactments to the contrary, persisted in carrying on the African Slave Trade. The object of the bill, was to render any British subject who might engage in this traffic liable to transportation for any period not exceeding fourteen years; and this measure, after passing through its respective stages in both Houses of Parliament, obtained the royal assent.

called the toleration act.* The Lords Holland and Stanhope, at the commencement of this business, declared their decided hostility to the measure; but leave was given to bring in the bill, which was read a first time, and ordered to be printed. It is scarcely possible to describe the sensation and cordial co-operation produced by Lord Sidmouth's bill among all classes of dissenters. In 48 hours, 336 petitions against the bill, from various congregations within 100 miles of London, signed only by males, above 16 years of age, were poured into the House of Lords;† and, when it came to be read a second time, on the 21st of May, it was encountered by 500 additional petitions from the country. Such an expression of the public feeling was not to be resisted: ministers themselves, and even the dignitaries of the church, now resisted the further progress of the measure, which was characterised by Lord Liverpool, as more likely to do harm than good; and not a single voice in the House of Lords, that of Lord Sidmouth alone excepted, was raised in favour of this attempt to explain and amend the toleration act.—Under these circumstances, the bill was rejected without a division.

On the 20th of May, Mr. Perceval opened the budget for the year. The supply voted for the public service, he stated at 54,308,453*l.* including a sum of 2,000,000*l.* granted to the government of Portugal, and 100,000*l.* granted as an eleemosynary aid to the distressed Portuguese. The loan for the present year, Mr. Perceval stated to amount to 12,000,000*l.* the interest on which sum he proposed to discharge by an additional duty on British and foreign spirits. He further stated it to be his intention to impose an additional duty on timber, pearl and potashes, and foreign linens, which, with a tax of one penny per pound on cotton wool, imported from the United States of America, he estimated at 866,600*l.* Owing, however, to the opposition made to the principle of taxing a raw material, the proposed duty on cotton-wool was abandoned; and a tax upon hats, which had long operated as a burdensome and vexatious impost on the fair trader, while it sunk into insignificance as a subject of revenue, shared the same fate.

One of the earliest acts of the Prince Regent, after his assumption of the royal functions, was the restoration of his brother, the Duke of York, to the post of Commander-in-Chief of the army; a measure which induced Lord Milton to propose a vote of censure upon the advisers of the Regent. The Chancellor of the Exchequer acknowledged in the fullest manner, the responsibility of his Majesty's servants in recommending the measure in question. Sir David Dundas, who had lately filled the office of Commander-in-Chief, after spending nearly half a century in the service of his country, had contracted an illness, which obliged him to apply for liberty to retire from the arduous duties of his station: and there was not the slightest hesitation in the mind of ministers, whom they should recommend to supply the vacancy thus created. The eminent services rendered to the army by the Duke of York, which were universally acknowledged, left them no choice. As to the proceedings on a former occasion, alluded to by the noble lord, they pledged the House to nothing; and there was not the most distant idea of lowering the dignity of Parliament by the advice given to the Prince Regent to re-appoint the Duke of York to the post of commander-in-chief. Amongst the speakers who addressed the House on this occasion, several gentlemen presented themselves who had, during the proceedings in the year 1809, taken part against the Duke of York, and who did not hesitate to avow, either that they had been formerly carried away by the current of public opinion, or that they considered the case as it now presented itself in a different point of view. The votes for Lord Milton's motion, were 47; against it, 296; constituting a majority of 249 in favour of the re-appointment. The nation at large seemed to have been affected with a similar change of opinion, and the duke resumed his post with all the facility of a public functionary who had quitted his office without imputation.‡

His Majesty's health, in the early part of the year underwent several variations; but, in the report of the queen's council, made on the 6th of July, a few days before the prorogation of Parliament, it was stated, "that his Majesty's health was not such as to enable his Majesty to resume the personal exercise of the royal functions."‖

This year was rendered memorable in the annals of Britain, by the establishment of a general, or national§ plan

* His Lordship had previously moved for, and obtained, Returns of the Archbishops and Bishops, of the number of churches and chapels of the Church of England, in every parish of 1000 persons and upwards; and of the number of other places of worship, not of the establishment; from which it appeared, that the number of churches and chapels of the establishment, amounted to 2547; and that the chapels and meeting-houses NOT of the establishment, besides many private houses used for religious worship, and not introduced in the enumeration, amounted to 3457. The smaller parishes, not amounting to 1000 inhabitants, were not returned. His Lordship observed, that, according to the act of William and Mary, all ministers in holy orders, or pretending to holy orders, provided they subscribed 26 of the 39 articles, and took the requisite oaths, might preach in any place of religious worship. This act was amended by the 19th of George III. which dispensed with the signing of any of the 39 articles, and required persons applying for licenses only to express their belief in the holy scriptures. Till within the last 30 or 40 years, he said, the toleration act had been construed in such a manner as to exclude all persons unqualified from want of the requisite talents and learning, and unfit, from the meanness of their situation, or the profligacy of their character, from exercising the functions of ministers of religion. But, subsequent to that period, all who offered themselves at the quarter sessions, provided they took the oaths, and made the declaration required by law, obtained the requisite certificates, not only as a matter of course, but as a matter of right. In order to remedy this evil, it was his intention to bring in a bill, in which he proposed, that to entitle any man to obtain a license as a preacher, he should have the recommendation of at least six respectable householders of the congregation to which he belonged; and that he should actually have a congregation which was willing to listen to his instructions. With regard to the preachers who were not stationary, but itinerant, he proposed that they should be required to bring a testimonial from six respectable householders, stating them to be of sober life and character, together with the belief that they were qualified to perform the functions of preachers. The effects which he expected to be produced by this bill were, that improper and unaccredited men would be prevented from assuming the most important of all duties—that of instructing their fellow creatures in the principles of religion and virtue.

† The grand and fundamental point of difference in church government between the established church and the dissenters is this: the former hold the opinion that religion and the temporal concerns of mankind should be united, and that to effect this union, the government ought to patronise and support a particular form of belief; whereas, the latter contend that religion ought to be an affair entirely between man and his Maker; that it stands not in need of the aid of the civil power for its support; and that, whenever that aid has been held out to religion, and accepted by it, the effect has been to diminish the force of religious principle, and to corrupt its purity and simplicity. Proceeding upon this leading principle of difference and separation from the established church, the dissenters objected to the bill introduced by Lord Sidmouth, as having a manifest and undoubted tendency to countenance the interference of the secular power, and to encroach upon religious rights. They considered the bill also, not only as objectionable and prejudicial in itself, but as paving the way for further encroachment upon the act of toleration; and as the commencement of a regular system of persecution and intolerance, which had already shewn itself among the magistracy in some parts of the country, and which it was incumbent upon the dissenters to arrest in its progress, before it had attained a maturity and strength which might baffle all their efforts.

‡ In the month of July, 1809, a trial took place on an action brought by Mr. Wright, an upholsterer, against Colonel Wardle, for goods furnished by order of the defendant to Mrs. Clarke, which order, as Mrs. Clarke deposed, was given by the colonel, on condition that she should put him in possession of all the evidence she possessed against the Duke of York, and appear at the bar of the House of Commons as a witness, in support of the charges preferred against His Royal Highness. The jury, after a patient investigation of the case, returned a verdict in favour of the plaintiff; on which Colonel Wardle indicted Mrs. Clarke and Mr. Wright for a conspiracy, but the evidence adduced failed to establish the charge; and, on this second trial, the colonel himself distinctly admitted, that he had advanced money to Mrs. Clarke.

‖ To the Catholics of Ireland, the determination of the Prince Regent to retain the ministers of his royal father, was a circumstance of extreme mortification. An impression had obtained universally, that the prince was a decided friend to their claims; and, on his investment with power, a lively hope burst upon the Catholic subject. But again, at least for a season, disappointment clouded their expectations, and ultimately produced some unpleasant results.

§ Mr. Joseph Lancaster, a member of the society of Quakers, had previously employed himself in the establishment of a school in the borough of Southwark, on a plan which attracted much attention: by this plan of education; and also for a census which was taken of the population of the kingdom, the result of which appears from the note, below.*

The peninsular war was carried on with considerable vigour, and attended by various success. On the 2d of January, Suchet made himself master of Tortosa; and, on the 23d of the same month, Olivença was taken possession of by Soult. On the latter day died the gallant and truly patriotic Marquis de la Romana, in a fit of apoplexy, at Badajoz, at the moment when he was quitting his horse to concert a plan of military operations with Lord Wellington. Within a month afterwards, Romana's corps, the command of which had devolved on General Mendizabel, was totally defeated, by Soult.

On the 25th of February, an expedition sailed from Cadiz, under the command of Lieutenant General Graham, the object of which was to attack the French who were employed in the siege of that city. On the 28th a body of English, Spaniards, and Portuguese were landed from the flotilla, at Algesiras; and, on the morning of the 5th of March, they arrived on the low ridge of Barrosa, about four miles to the southward of the mouth of the river Santi Petri. This ridge, continuing on the north the extensive heathy plain of Chiclana, reaches inland about a mile and a half. A noble forest of pines, skirting the plain, and encircling the height at some distance, terminated at the river, the intermediate space between the north side of the height and the forest being broken and uneven ground. So situated, General Graham, and La Penas, the Spanish commander, found themselves obliged to attack the French army, of about 8,000 men, in two divisions, commanded by Victor. A spirited and successful attack on the rear of the enemy's lines near Santi Petri, made by the vanguard of the Spaniards under General Ladrizabel, opened the communication with the Isle of Leon; after which, General Graham moved down from the position of Barrosa to the Torre de Bermesa, about half way to the Santi Petri, to secure the communication across that river, over which a bridge had been recently thrown. This position occupied a narrow woody ridge, the right of which extended to the sea, and the left fell down to the Almanza creek, on the edge of a marsh. General Graham, whilst making this movement, received notice that the enemy had appeared in force on the plain of Chiclana, and was advancing towards the heights of Barrosa. Considering that position as the key to Santi Petri, the English General immediately made a counter march, to support the troops left for its defence. However, before this corps could wholly disentangle itself from the woods, the troops on the ridge of Barrosa were seen retiring, whilst the left wing of the enemy was rapidly ascending. His right was, at the same time, posted on the plain at the edge of the wood. To retreat in the face of an enemy superior in numbers, and so advantageously posted, would have exposed the allies to great danger: relying, therefore, on the courage of his troops, an immediate attack was determined on by the English commander. A powerful battery, of ten guns, was accordingly opened on the enemy's centre, by Major Duncan. The brigade this system children were taught reading, writing, and the most common and useful rules of arithmetic, in a very short space of time, and at a very little expense. This saving of time, labour, and expense, was effected principally by making the boys at once teachers and learners; and by a process which united great simplicity and quickness with great effect. Soon after Mr. Lancaster established his school and made known his plan of education, he was patronized by the King; and it is recorded of his Majesty, that in a conversation held with Mr. Lancaster, he expressed the benevolent wish, "That every subject in his dominions should be able to read his bible." Many, however, considered this system of education, as decidedly hostile to the interests, and even to the existence of the established church, because the children were not instructed in the peculiar doctrines of that community. Dr. Bell, a clergyman of the established church; who had been in India, had, soon after his return from that country, and before Mr. Lancaster had thought of his plan, published a pamphlet, in which he detailed the mode of education which he had practised at a seminary established in Madras. Mr. Lancaster has acknowledged, that the perusal of Dr. Bell's work suggested the idea to him. The schools established by Mr. Lancaster gave birth to the formation of a society under the designation of "The British and Foreign School Society." A rival institution was also established under the auspices of Dr. Bell, with the name of "The National School Society," at the head of which establishment appears a large proportion of the dignitaries of the church, and the leading men of the state. The object of the former is to afford learning to the poor at home and abroad without regard to any particular creed, or preference to any religious community; and the design of the latter, to instruct the children of the poor in the doctrines of the established religion, as well as in the common and useful branches of education. Schools, upon the plan either of Dr. Bell or of Mr. Lancaster, have also been formed in many regiments, and the Commander-in-chief, in public orders, has called upon the chaplains of the army to attend in the most scrupulous manner to this duty.

of guards, with Lieutenant Colonel Brown's flank battalion, Lieutenant Colonel Norcott's two companies of the second rifle corps, and Major Acheson, with a part of the 67th foot, separated from the regiment in the wood, formed on the right, under the command of Brigadier-General Dilkes. The left was formed by Colonel Wheatley's brigade with three companies of the Coldstream guards, under Lieutenant-Colonel Jackson —separated also from his battalion in the wood—and Lieutenant-Colonel Barnard's flank battalion. The infantry having been thus hastily arranged, the artillery advanced to a more favourable position, and kept up a most destructive fire on the enemy.

The right wing of the allies proceeded to the attack of General Rufin's division on the hill, whilst Lieutenant Colonel Barnard's battalion, and Lieutenant Colonel Burke's detachment of Portuguese, were warmly engaged with the French tirailleurs. Notwithstanding the carnage produced by Major Duncan's battery, General Laval's division, opening a heavy fire of musketry, advanced in very formidable masses. Maintaining a constant fire, the left wing of the English now advanced; the result of which was the total defeat of Laval's corps. Major Gough took the eagle of the 8th regiment of light infantry. Equal success crowned the exertions of the right wing of the English: the enemy met General Dilkes on the ascent of the hill: the contest was sanguinary; but the undaunted perseverance of the British surmounted every obstacle; and General Rufin's division having been driven from the heights, lost two pieces of cannon. Within an hour and a half from the commencement of the action the French were in full retreat; but, after so unequal a contest, the allies found pursuit impracticable. On this occasion, the enemy lost about 3,000 in killed, wounded, and prisoners, with 6 pieces of cannon, their ammunition waggons, a number of horses, and several eagles. General Bellegarde, Chief of the Staff, and Aid-de-camp of Marshal Victor, 1 Colonel, and many other officers were killed, and several wounded and taken. Amongst the prisoners, were the General of Division, Rufin, and Russian General of Brigade: the latter soon after died of his wounds. The English lost in killed and wounded, about 1243, amongst whom were several officers high in estimation. It should be mentioned that Sir Richard Keats very ably seconded the operations of the army; and a small body of seamen and marines stormed and dismantled the works of the enemy at the mouth of the Guadaleté.

General Graham, finding it impossible to procure supplies, withdrew the next day across the Santi Petri, and afterwards returned to Cadiz.—The whole allied force, in the action of Barrosa, did not amount to 6,000; of which 3,000 only were English; whilst the number of the enemy was about 8,000, all of them well appointed, ably commanded, and in a high state of discipline.

About this period, General Massena began his retreat from Santarem, where he had never found an opportunity to attack Lord Wellington with any favourable prospect. The vanguard of Lord Wellington attacked Massena's rear near Pombal, and drove it from its position, on the 11th of March; but this advantage was more than counterpoised by the loss of Badajoz, which, after a vigorous resistance, surrendered to Marshal Soult on the same day.

Massena, continuing his retreat through Portugal, was closely pursued by Lord Wellington. General Beresford, on the 25th of March, attacked the advanced guard of Marshal Mortier, and pursued it to the gates of Badajoz, and on the 15th of April, he forced Olivença to capitulate. On the 10th of the same month, the Catalonians took Figueras by surprise, having maintained intelligence with the Italian troops in that place. They are said to have put all the French to the sword. Lord Wellington attacked the rear of Massena's army on the 3d of April, and after a spirited contest, the French position was carried by the bayonet. Lord Wellington in turn was attacked by Massena in his position of Fuente de Honore, on the 3d of May. The French gained some advantage at the commencement of the action; but they were at length obliged to repass the Agueda, without accomplishing their object of throwing a body of troops into Almeida. The garrison of that fortress, however, succeeded in evacuating the place, and blowing up the works in view of the British, on the 10th of May.

Massena, rapidly pursued by the English, conducted his retreat in the most able manner, but his route was tracked by the most horrible desolation.

By the 8th of May, General Beresford had invested Badajoz, and repelled, though with some loss, the sorties of the garrison. Scarcely had the siege been commenced when General Beresford received the intelligence that Marshal Soult had left Seville, with 15,000 men, and was marching to the relief of Badajos. This information was repeated on the night of the 12th of May, in consequence of which, the English Commander immediately suspended his operations, removed the battering cannon, and stores to Elvas, and, having been joined on the 14th, by the Spanish Generals Castanos and Blake, he prepared to meet the enemy. Soult, in the afternoon of the 15th, appeared in front of the allies with a force of about 20,000 men, having been joined in his march, by Mauburg's corps of 5,000 troops. The allied army completed its dipositions for receiving the enemy on the morning of the 16th: it was then formed in two lines, on a rising ground, running nearly parallel to the little river Albuera. Several of the Spanish corps, although they made forced marches, were unable to join the army till the middle of the preceding night. At eight o'clock in the morning the French army was observed to be motion; and, at some distance above the right of the allies, the cavalry was seen passing the river. Soon afterwards, they moved a strong force of cavalry, and two heavy columns of infantry directly towards the front of the allies, as though to attack the bridge and village of Albuera. Soult was at the same time filing the principal body of his infantry over the river to the right, under cover of his cavalry, which was greatly superior to that of the allies. To turn their right flank, was his apparent intention. He commenced the attack, which was bravely sustained by the allies, at nine o'clock. Great intrepidity and consummate skill were displayed on both sides, and the conflict was of a most sanguinary nature. The English, Spanish, and Portuguese troops nobly supported the honour of their respective countries; and, after a long and well fought battle, their exertions were rewarded by victory. General Beresford, however, on account of his inferiority in cavalry, did not deem it prudent to hazard a pursuit, but contented himself with driving the enemy across the river. Independently of the loss sustained by General Blake's corps, this brilliant affair cost the allies, in killed wounded and missing, 4,537 men, amongst whom were many officers of distinction and merit. Five French Generals were killed or wounded; and the total loss of the enemy was estimated at nearly 9,000.

Soult retired to the ground which he had occupied previously to the battle, and on the morning of the 18th, leaving Badajoz to his fate, he recommenced his retreat towards Seville. General Beresford again invested Badajoz, and Lord Wellington advanced with the grand army to superintend the operations of the siege. His Lordship made two unsuccessful assaults on the fort of St. Christoval; but, in consequence of the junction of the two armies of Marmont and Soult, he found it expedient to raise the siege about the middle of June.

In other parts of Spain, the Patriots were extremely unfortunate. On the 28th of June, Suchet took Tarragona by assault; on the 1st of August, General Blake was repulsed by the enemy in an attack on Niebla; and, on the 9th of August, Soult defeated the army of Murcia, in the vicinity of Baza. On the 14th of August the Spaniards surprised the French in Santander; and on the 19th Figueras was retaken by the French General Macdonald, after a long and very difficult blockade; and, on the 25th the Spanish General Abudia was defeated feated by Dorsenne in the neighbourhood of Astorga.—Lord Wellington formed the blockade of Ciudad Rodrigo on the 4th of September; but, on the 25th he retired, and his rear was attacked by the advanced guard of Marmont. The infantry, however, forming a square, and presenting a firm front, retreated without being broken. The English army quitted its entrenched camp at Fuente Guinaldo, on the 27th the French attacked its rear guard near Aldea de Ponte, but they were repulsed. General Hill, with a division of the allied army, by a series of bold and skilful manœuvres, surprised and completely routed a French column, commanded by General Gerard, on the 28th of October.—Suchet took the town of Murviedro, and on the 29th of September, he invested the castle which is built on the ruins of the ancient Saguntum. General Blake attacked him on the 25th of the following month; but Suchet was victorious, and the castle capitulated on the 26th. Suchet passed the Guadalquiver on the 26th of December, defeated the Patriots, and compelled Blake to retire within the walls of Valencia. The Baron d'Eroles, however, had defeated the French, near Perigeorda on the 26th of October.

A. D. 1812.] On the 9th of January, the city of Valencia capitulated, with an army of more than 16,000 men. By this event, immense magazines also fell into the hands of the enemy. The commencement of this year was distinguished by the raising of the siege of Tariffa, which had been bravely defended by a small garrison of English and Spaniards, from the 20th of December to the 4th of January. On the 19th of January Lord Wellington, after a fortnight's siege, carried Ciudad Rodrigo by assault. General Crauford, an officer of exalted merit, fell mortally wounded in the breach at the head of his men. In the eastern parts of the kingdom, the Patriotic Generals carried on the war against the common enemy with considerable spirit. The French commander Montbrun was compelled to retire from before Alicant, after an ineffectual cannonade of the fortress. The French attacked General Lacy, who was posted on the heights of Altafalla, near Tarragona on the 24th of January. The Patriots eminently distinguished themselves; but, overwhelmed by the numbers and discipline of the enemy, they were ultimately obliged to retreat to the mountains. By the treachery of its governor, the town of Peniscola, a place of great strength, seated on a bold promontory, overlooking the Mediterranean, was soon afterwards surrendered to the French.

General Ballasteros attacked and defeated near Malaga, a French corps commanded by General Marausin, on the 16th of February. On the 16th of the following month, Lord Wellington again invested Badajoz; and, on the 31st, he opened his fire from 26 pieces of artillery. His Lordship's operations were continued with extraordinary spirit and activity; new batteries were opened; and, in the evening of the 5th of April, practicable breaches were effected in the bastions of St. Maria and La Trinidad. As the enemy were making the most formidable preparations for the defence of those breaches, Lord Wellington did not think it expedient to precipitate the assault. He ordered all the guns of the batteries in the second parallel to be directed against the curtain of La Trinidad; and, in the evening of the 6th a third breach was effected. The English troops advanced to the attack, which was led by Lieutenant General Picton, and Major General Kempt, at 10 o'clock at night. General Kempt was wounded in crossing the river Rivellas; notwithstanding which, and the obstinate resistance of the besieged, the Castle of Badajoz was carried by escalade, and the third division of the English army was established in it half an hour before midnight. In the interim, Major Wilson of the 48th carried the raveline of St. Roque, and with the assistance of Major Squire of the engineers, established himself in that work. Major General Colville, with the 4th division, and Lieutenant Colonel Barnard, with the light division, advanced to the attack of the breaches in the bastions of Santa Maria and La Trinadad; but, though the attack was made with the utmost vigour and intrepidity, so formidable were the obstacles prepared by the enemy upon and behind the bridges, and so determined was the resistance, that they could not succeed in their attempt. Numbers of officers and soldiers were killed or wounded by explosions at the top of the breaches; and others, in succession, were compelled to give way! These efforts were renewed without success, till after midnight, when Lord Wellington ordered the two divisions to retire to the ground which they occupied immediately before the assault. In the mean time, Major General Walker forced the barrier on the road of Olivença, and entered the covered way on the left of the bastion of St. Vincent, close to the Guadiana. There he descended into the ditch and escaladed the bastion. Lieutenant General Leith supported this attack with the 38th regiment, under Lieutenant Colonel Nugent, and the 15th Portuguese regiment under Lieutenant Colonel De Regeo. After these proceedings, the 4th and light divisions having been formed again for the assault of the breaches, General Philippon, the Governor, surrendered the city. The garrison, consisting of about 4,000 men remained prisoners of war. This splendid triumph, on the part of the allies, was purchased by the sacrifice of 4,825 English and Portuguese killed and wounded in the siege and assault. The ordnance found at Badajoz consisted of 133 brass guns, 19 brass mortars, and 20 howitzers; besides 5,181 muskets with bayonets, besides an immense quantity of powder, bags, shot, shells, and materials for the construction of gun carriages.

Not long after the capture of Badajoz, a brilliant atchievement was performed by General Hill with a separate division of the allied army. After a march of seven days, through a mountainous and difficult country, he took Almarez by assault, and on the 10th of May, returned to his position.—Lord Wellington having advanced almost without opposition to Salamanca, the English army entered that city amidst the grateful acclamations of the people. The French had left garrisons in the three forts of Salamanca; of these, St. Caystano was taken by assault, La Mercede was taken by escalade: and St. Vincente surrendered by capitulation on the 27th of June. Soon afterwards a grand scene of operations was opened. The French army, now commanded by Marmont, Massena having been recalled to Paris, passed the Douro on the evening of the 16th of July. Various and intricate movements followed. In the course of the night, the enemy recrossed the Douro, at Toro, and moved with their whole force to Tordesillas, where, on the morning of the 17th they again crossed the Douro, and assembled their army at La Maradel Rey, having marched about thirty miles in the course of the day. In the afternoon of the 21st both the armies, after a great variety of movements, crossed the Tormes; the allies, by the bridge of Salamanca and the neighbouring fords, and the French by the fords between the Alba de Torres and Huerta. Lord Wellington placed his troops in a position of which the right was upon one of the two heights called Dos Arapiles, the left on the Tormes below the ford of St. Martha. Each army had left a considerable corps on the right of the Tormes. In the course of the night, the French took possession of the village of Calvarosa de Arabi, and of the height near it called Neustra Senorœ de la Pena, the English cavalry being in possession of Calvarosa de Abaxo. The next morning, soon after day light, detachments from both armies endeavoured to obtain possession of the more distant of the two heights of Arapiles. The French succeeded in gaining that point, which considerably strengthened their position and increased their means of annoyance: Lord Wellington was consequently induced to make some changes in his position. After various evolutions, Marmont, about 2 in the afternoon, under cover of a heavy cannonade, extended his left, and moved forward his army. This extension, though his troops continued to occupy a strong and well defended position, afforded Lord Wellington an advantageous opportunity of directing his attacks. The engagement soon became general, and after numerous attacks, repulses, and evolutions, which continued until night, the French were totally defeated and compelled to fly. Notwithstanding the darkness of the night, the number of prisoners amounted to about 7,000, amongst whom were 1 General, 3 Lieutenant Colonels, and 130 inferior officers. Eleven pieces of cannon, several ammunition waggons, 6 stands of colours, and 2 eagles, also fell into the hands of the allies. Marmont himself was severely wounded early in the action. In killed, wounded and missing, the loss of the allies amounted to 5,220, and that of the enemy is thought to have been much greater. In this action, the Portuguese displayed great bravery and sustained a heavy loss; their killed and wounded amounting to 1,856.—Joseph Buonaparte marched from Madrid on the 21st of July, with a body of troops, amounting it was said to 2,000 horse, and 12,000 foot, to join Marmont; but, receiving intelligence of his defeat at Salamanca, he marched towards Segovia. The allies pushed forward; and, as the first consequence of their important victory, obtained possession of Madrid.

Lord Wellington next advanced towards Burgos. He succeeded in making himself master of some of the outworks, but failed in all his attempts against the castle, and at length raised the siege after sustaining considerable loss. This was the last military event of importance which took place between the British and the enemy this year in Spain. The patriotic corps, however, had numerous skirmishes with the French, and were frequently successful. The guerillas also carried on their desultory operations with wonderful enterprise and effect.

In the course of the autumn, the enemy, who had long but ineffectually besieged Cadiz, broke up from before that place, evacuated Seville, Grenada, Cordova, and all the south of Spain. Their subsequent movements indicating an intention of concentrating their force on the north side of the Ebro. By a decree of the Regency and the Cortes, Lord Wellington was constituted Generalissimo of the Spanish armies. His Lordship had previously been created Earl and afterwards Marquis of Wellington, titles which he had nobly acquired by his conduct of the peninsular war.

In a domestic light, this year, by a re-union of all the prerogatives of the crown in the person of the Prince Regent, may be considered as the actual commencement of a new reign. Parliament met on the 7th of January. The royal speech, delivered by the Lord Chancellor, after lamenting the disappointment of the hopes so confidently entertained of his Majesty's speedy recovery, congratulated Parliament on the skill and valour displayed by the British army in the peninsula of Spain and Portugal, as well as upon the extinction of the colonial power of the enemy in the east; and concluded with an assurance on the part of the Regent, that he would continue to employ all such means of conciliation for adjusting the existing differences between Great Britain and America, as might be consistent with the honour and dignity of his Majesty's crown.

A melancholy change had taken place, about the beginning of July, 1811, in the King's health, and though, from that period, his Majesty had been able at intervals to converse with his medical attendants, the symptoms of his illness gradually became more discouraging, until, in the beginning of the present year, they had assumed such an aspect as almost to close the door of hope against his complete restoration to mental health. At a very early period of the session, Mr. Perceval came forward with a plan (which was ultimately agreed to) for the arrangement of his Majesty's household, which seemed neither to imply confident hope nor absolute despair of his recovery.*

On the 13th of February, when the Regency restrictions were on the eve of their termination, the Prince addressed a letter to the Duke of York, in which he expressed his approbation of the conduct of ministers, and his intention to retain them in office. The letter, however, concluded with the expression of a wish on the part of his Royal Highness, that some of those persons with whom the early habits of his public life were formed, would strengthen his hands, and constitute a part of his government. Two days after the date of this letter, Lords Grey and Grenville, to whom the Duke of York had, in compliance with the request of the Prince Regent, communicated his sentiments, addressed a reply to his Royal Highness, from which it was evident that all attempts to accomplish a fair and honourable union between Lords Grey and Grenville and the present ministers, must prove fruitless. Thus Mr. Perceval was fixed more firmly than before in his office of prime minister.

The ministry now consisted of two parties, at the head of one of which was Mr. Perceval, and at the head of the other the Marquis Wellesley. The differences between these statesmen were partly personal and partly political; the high and aspiring views of the Marquis Wellesley would not permit him to serve under Mr. Perceval, though he had no objection to serve with him, or to serve under either Earl Moira or Lord Holland; and when it appeared that the Regent intended to continue Mr. Perceval at the head of his councils, the Marquis resigned the seals of his office into the hands of his Royal Highness. On the resignation of this minister, the seals of the foreign department were put into the hands of the Earl of Liverpool, pro tempore; but Lord Castlereagh was afterwards appointed to that department; and the Earl continued in his station of secretary of state for war and the colonies. Lord Boringdon's motion, for an address to the Regent, beseeching his Royal Highness to form an efficient administration, was negatived, by 165 against 72.

The first year of the Regency had been eminently distinguished by success abroad; but, at home, great distress and dissatisfaction prevailed; in various parts of the country, disturbances of a very alarming nature burst forth; and in the metropolis, events occurred during the winter of 1811, which excited the alarm and

* Parliament, he said, had last year made full provision for supplying the exercise of the royal authority; and as the law now stood, all the prerogatives, as well as all the duties of the sovereign, would, on the 18th of February, devolve on the Prince Regent; and as the civil list would of course at that time be transferred to his Royal Highness, it became necessary to make some provision for the personal comfort and dignity of the King. His Majesty's civil list he considered as the proper fund for such a provision; and as separate establishments for the Regent and the King would now be necessary, he had to propose that an addition of 70,000*l.* per annum should be made to the civil list, out of the consolidated fund. As the Lord Steward and Lord Chamberlain had duties to perform immediately connected with the royal functions, these officers should be placed round the person of the Regent; and, in their room, the first gentlemen of the bed-chamber should be substituted as the chief officer of the King's household, with the vice-chancellor as his deputy; four Lords and as many grooms of the bed-chamber, a master of the robes, and seven or eight equerries, together with his Majesty's private secretary, should form the new officers of the proposed establishment, which of course must be placed under the controul of the queen, to whom the care of his Majesty's person must continue to be intrusted. The annual expense of this establishment was estimated at 100,000*l.* and this sum it was proposed to take from the civil list, with a reservation that any deficiency should be drawn from the treasury, and that any surplus should go in aid of the public supplies. In the circumstances which the Queen was placed, it was judged proper to add 10,000*l.* a year to her income. It was further proposed, that all pensions and allowances which the King was accustomed to grant to the objects of his bounty, were to be paid as formerly out of the privy purse; that the expenses incurred for medical assistance should be paid out of the revenue of the duchy of Lancaster; and lastly, that a commission of three persons should be appointed, one of them to be a master in chancery, and the other two to be named by the Queen and the Prince Regent, for the management of the King's private property. In virtue of this arrangement, 100,000*l.* were to be appropriated to the King's household, together with 60,000*l.* the amount of the King's privy purse, and 10,000*l.* to the Queen, making an aggregate sum of 170,000*l.* a year. To meet these charges, the Prince Regent consented to give up his exchequer income of 50,000*l.* a year, which, with the 70,000*l.* voted by Parliament, would leave a deficiency of 50,000*l.*; but this sum, it was judged, might be dispensed with, as the Prince had not so large a family as his royal father. The plan proposed by Mr. Perceval ultimately passed, and also a bill, by which the sum of 100,000*l.* was voted to the Prince Regent to meet the expences which his Royal Highness had incurred, or might yet incur, on his assumption of the royal authority. The liberality of Parliament was likewise called forth in favour of the Princesses Augusta, Elizabeth, Mary, and Sophia, to each of whom a grant of 9,000*l.* per annum was made, exclusive of 4,000 per annum, granted to each of the princesses from the civil list, in the 18th and 39th years of his Majesty's reign.

apprehension

apprehension of the inhabitants in a most extraordinary degree. Under the impression of alarm, a cry was raised for the establishment of an armed police; but the rashness of this proposal was soon detected, and the principal measure resorted to by government on this occasion was the establishment of a more efficient nightly watch than had hitherto existed in the metropolis.*

On the 11th of May, the proceedings of Parliament, were interrupted, and the whole nation was thrown into the utmost consternation and horror, by the assassination of Mr. Perceval, the prime minister. At half past five o'clock in the afternoon, that gentleman was entering the lobby of the House of Commons, when a person, who had some time before taken his station in the recess of the door-way, drew out a small pocket pistol, and shot him in the lower part of the left breast. Mr. Perceval, on receiving the shot, merely moved forward a few steps, and as he was in the act of falling, a gentleman stepped forward, and caught him in his arms. The only word that escaped his lips after receiving the shot was, "murder," or "murdered," uttered in a low, faint, and nearly inarticulate voice. A surgeon was immediately sent for, but the ball had entered the heart, and before the return of the messenger Mr. Perceval had breathed his last. Amidst the general horror and dismay no attempt was made for some time to secure the assassin; but when a spectator at last exclaimed, "Where is the villian who fired?" a person, who had remained unobserved, stepped forward, and coolly said, "I am the unfortunate man." The prisoner, who had made no attempt to escape, was seized by General Gascoigne, and conveyed to the bar of the House of Commons. An immediate examination took place in the House of Commons, before several of the members who were in the commission of the peace, and the assassin himself, when questioned on the subject, said—"My name is John Bellingham—it is a private injury—I know what I have done—it was a denial of justice on the part of the government." Being cautioned not to criminate himself, he added—"I have admitted the fact—I do admit it—I have been ill-treated—they all know who I am, and what I am, through the Secretary of State and Mr. Beckett, with whom I have had frequent communications—they knew of my intention six weeks ago, through the Bow-Street magistrates—I have sought redress in vain—I am an unfortunate man, and feel here (pointing to his heart) sufficient justification of the act I have committed." At the conclusion of the examination the prisoner was committed to the prison-room of the House of Commons, and at one o'clock in the morning, conveyed, under an escort of dragoons, to Newgate.

An opinion instantly became prevalent that the murder of Mr. Perceval was the first act of a deep and extensive conspiracy, and the departure of the post was delayed till dispatches could be made out, and instructions prepared, for the civil and military authorities in the different parts of the kingdom, particularly in the disturbed counties. It was desirable, in a case of this nature, that no unnecessary time should be lost between the commission of the crime and the infliction of the punishment awarded by the law against the delinquent. The deed was committed on Monday evening; the prisoner was tried and convicted on the Friday following; and, on the ensuing Monday, the execution took place.†

The day after the assasination of Mr. Perceval, a message was sent down to Parliament by the Prince Regent, expressing the wish of his Royal Highness that a suitable provision should be made for the family of the deceased premier. A grant of 2,000*l.* a year was accordingly made to Mrs. Perceval, and the sum of 50,000*l.* voted by the liberality of Parliament to her twelve children. It was afterwards proposed, and agreed to, that the annuity of Mrs. Perceval should, at her demise, descend to her eldest son.‡

On the death of Mr. Perceval, great difficulty was found

* The most dreadful occurrence was that of the family of Mr. Timothy Marr, Linen draper, Ratcliffe-Highway, consisting of himself, his wife, an infant son, fourteen weeks old, and an apprentice boy, being all found murdered, between twelve and one o'clock on Sunday morning, the 8th of December, 1811. On entering the house, James Gohen, the apprentice, was found lying on his face in the shop, with his brains dashed out, and part of them actually forced against the ceiling. Mrs. Marr was found lying on the floor, near the street door, and Mr. Marr behind the counter, in the shop, both weltering in their blood, from mortal wounds in the head; and the child in the cradle, had its throat cut from ear to ear. Plunder was no doubt the object of the murderer; but the unexpected return of the servant maid, who had been dispatched at night, to obtain some oysters, created an alarm, and obliged him to decamp without his booty. On the 19th of the same month, another family was murdered in Gravel-Lane, in the same neighbourhood, and with circumstances which led to the suspicion that the bloody intent was formed in the same sanguinary mind, and executed by the same relentless hand. The scene of this second series of murders was the King's Arms public-house, and the victims were Mr. and Mrs. Williamson, the keepers of that house, and their servant maid. A lodger, roused by the cries of murder, let himself out of a two pair of stairs window by the sheets of his bed, and alarmed the neighbourhood. On the outer door being forced open, the mistress of the house, and the maid servant, were found lying one upon the other, by the kitchen fire, quite dead, with their throats cut from ear to ear; and on continuing the search, Mr. Williamson was found in the cellar, a corpse, with one of his legs broken, and his head nearly severed from his body. The murderer unfortunately had escaped. The retributive finger of Providence, however, speedily pointed to the person of John Williams, alias Murphy, a sailor, who had, for some months, lodged at a neighbouring public-house; and the evidence of the guilt of this wretch was every day accumulating, when, on the 27th of December, he terminated an existence which had become intolerable, by hanging himself with his neck-kerchief, in his cell in the Cold-Bath-Fields prison. The coroner's inquest on this occasion, returned a verdict of felo de se, and the body of the assassin and suicide was committed to the earth with every possible mark of ignominy.

† Of the fact of the murder the evidence was too clear to admit of any doubt; but the sanity of the prisoner was involved in some uncertainty. On his trial, he conducted himself with great coolness and self-possession: he displayed a mind not wanting in quick perception, but apt to draw erroneous conclusions; he discovered intellectual powers which could discern all the tendencies of human action, and estimate its several qualities; bewildered, however, by passion, and stimulated to the confiness of madness, by an acute sense of supposed injury, he considered himself as the judge of his own actions, and claimed the right to avenge his own wrongs. He seemed fully and deeply impressed with the idea that the act he had committed was perfectly justifiable; that his acquittal was certain, and that his conduct would be approved by the nation. His defence was remarkable for its acuteness: he stated that he had been engaged in extensive mercantile concerns in Russia; that, by the tyranny and oppression of that government, he had been stripped of nearly all his property, and thrown into prison; that he had applied repeatedly, but unsuccessfully, to Lord Granville Leveson Gower, the British ambassador at St. Petersburgh, for redress. In consequence of this he had returned to England, where he had laid the hardships and injustice of his case before his Majesty's ministers, but they also refused to do any thing in his behalf. He then formed his resolution: this resolution he communicated to the officers at Bow-Street, and they had transmitted it to the treasury; but instead of obtaining redress, he was told, he might do his worst; and he had obeyed these instructions. Towards Mr. Perceval he had no antipathy or ill-will. He was sorry, as sorry as any of the friends of that gentleman could be, for his fate; but he was convinced that much public good would result from it, and that ministers would be taught, by the lesson he had given them, to pay more attention to the just claims of individuals. He concluded by expressing his firm persuasion that it was impossible to convict him of the crime of wilful murder, unless it were proved that he had malice prepense towards the unfortunate gentleman for whose death he was then on his trial, and towards whom he utterly denied all personal ill-will. At the close of this singular defence his counsel wished to put in a plea of insanity; but this the prisoner rejected, declaring, that he acted from a well-defined motive; that reflection, instead of creating compunction and remorse for the deed which he had done, only tended to convince him of the propriety of his conduct, and to console him under its consequences; and that he should prefer a thousand deaths to the injuries and indignities he had experienced. After a suitable charge from Mr. Justice Mansfield, the jury retired, and on their return into court pronounced the fatal verdict of guilty. In the brief interval between the prisoner's conviction and execution, his behaviour was composed and tranquil. To the last he laboured under the delusion that the murder he had committed was justifiable; the moment before he was led from his cell to the scaffold, he solemnly declared, in answer to the inquiries of the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of London, that he had no accomplices; a declaration which appears to have been strictly correct.

‡ Spencer Perceval, was the second son of John, the late Earl of Egmont, by Catherine Compton, sister of Spencer, Earl of Northampton. His mother was, in 1770, created a peeress of Ireland in her own right, with the title of Baroness Arden; and dying in 1784, she was succeeded by her eldest son, Charles George, who, in July 1808, was raised to the Peerage of England. Mr. Perceval, as soon as he had completed his collegiate studies, at Cambridge, entered himself a member of Lincoln's Inn, and pursued the study of the law as a profession. He was remarkable for close and regular application. On the death of his uncle, in 1796, a vacancy was created in the borough of Northampton, which place introduced Mr. Perceval to parliamentary life. He immediately gave his support to Mr. Pitt, and pursued the same line of politics, regularly and consistently, through the whole of his parliamentary career. In 1801, at the formation found in the formation of a new ministry; but, the object was at length accomplished, and Lord Liverpool was declared premier.*

In consequence of the distress of the commercial and manufacturing classes, the new ministers at length consented to the repeal of the orders in council; and on the 23d of June, a declaration from the Prince Regent appeared in the London Gazette, absolutely and unequivocally revoking these orders as far as they regarded American vessels; with the proviso, that if, after the notification of this repeal by the British minister in America, the government of the United States should not revoke their interdictory acts against British commerce, that revocation on our part should be null and void. It afterwards appeared, that five days before the document announcing their repeal appeared in the London Gazette, the government of the United States of America had declared war against Great Britain.

On the 17th of June, Mr. Vansittart, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, brought forward the budget† of the taxes. That principally opposed in Parliament was the increased duty on leather; but this opposition, though strong, was unavailing, and the entire budget received the sanction of Parliament.

The advocates of the Catholic cause resolved to appeal again to the legislature; and Mr. Canning rose, in the Commons, on the 22d of June, to propose, "That the House will, early in the next session of Parliament, take into its most serious consideration the state of the laws affecting his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects in Great Britain and Ireland, with a view to such a final and conciliatory adjustment as may be conducive to the peace and strength of the united kindom; to the stability of the Protestant establishment; and to the general satisfaction and concord of all classes of his Majesty's subjects." This motion was carried by a majority of 235 against 106. A similar motion, in the Lords, by the Marquis Wellesley, on the 1st of July, was supported by 125, and opposed by 126 voices. Of the royal Dukes, two voted on one side, and three on the other; even the bench of bishops was divided, three of them voting for, and fifteen against the pledge to consider the subject.‡

In April, when Buonaparte was meditating a war against Russia, he made overtures for peace with England, and a correspondence took place upon the subject, which terminated unsuccessfully, after the interchange of a single dispatch between the foreign ministers of the two governments; Buonaparte having demanded, as a preliminary, the recognition of the Corsican dynasty in Spain. No notice of this correspondence was taken in Parliament before the 17th of July. On the 30th of July, Parliament was prorogued; and on the 29th of September, a proclamation was issued by the Prince Regent announcing its dissolution.§

The year 1812 will be for ever memorable in history, for the disastrous campaign of Buonaparte against Russia. The refusal of the Emperor Alexander to shut his ports against the commerce of Britain, and thereby to ruin his subjects, and to impoverish the Imperial revenue, was at once the ostensible and the real cause of Buonaparte's hostilities. Alexander no longer chose to support what the enemy of Europe had been pleased to term the continental system. The object of the invader was great, and the army which he assembled for the atchievement of that object, was in full proportion to its magnitude. According to a statement of the Earl of Liverpool, the number of the French army, previously to its entrance on the Russian territory, was not fewer than 360,000 men; and some estimates ran it up to nearly 500,000. In assembling this immense force, much time was necessarily employed. Buonaparte left Paris, for Dresden, on the 25th of May; on the 22d of June, he declared war against Russia; on mation of the Addington administration. Mr. Perceval, then in his 39th year, was appointed Solicitor-General; and in 1802, he was promoted to the situation of Attorney-General, on the elevation of Edward Law, now Lord Ellenborough, to the chief-justiceship of the court of King's Bench. He first came forward as a public speaker after the death of Mr. Pitt. When the Fox administration quitted office, in the early part of the year 1807, Mr. Perceval was appointed chancellor of the exchequer; and, on the death of the Duke of Portland, he became prime minister. As a public speaker, he rose much in reputation after he had become prime minister; and in domestic life, few men were more amiable or more deservedly respected.

† The amount of the charges to be be provided by the supplies, he stated at 62,376,348*l.* from which 7,025,700*l.* was to be deducted for Ireland, leaving a total to be provided for by Great Britain for the year 1812, of 55,350,648*l.* This sum certainly was an enormous, he might say a terrible extent of charge; but, he had the consolation to reflect that, great as it was, the resources of the country were still equal to support it; and by an enumeration of the ways and mean, he produced a result of 55,390,460*l.*, including a loan made on the preceding day, for 15,650,000*l.* In the course of the present year, a former loan had been obtained to the amount of 6,789,625*l.* which added to the loan as stated above, and to the exchequer bills funded in 1812, created an annual interest of 1,905,924*l.*, which was to be provided for by new taxes. For this purpose he proposed to discontinue the bounty on the exportation of printed goods; to double the duty on tanned hides and skins; to double also the duty on glass; to add one tenth to the existing duty on tobacco; to subject all property offered to sale by auction to the auction duty, under certain modifications; to make an addition of one penny to the postage of all letters carried more than twenty miles; and to increase the assessed taxes on male servants, carriages, horses, dogs, and game certificates; the aggregate annual product of which taxes he estimated at 1,903,000*l.*

‡ To extend and secure the privileges of the dissenters, a bill was introduced into Parliament by Lord Castlereagh on the 10th of July, by which it was proposed to repeal the intolerant statutes, known by the designation of the conventicle and five-mile acts, and to make it obligatory upon preachers, when required to take the oath and declaration, set forth in the 19th of George III. cap. 44.; and upon justices of the peace, to administer such oath and to take such declaration when applied to for that purpose Meetings for worship, in which the persons assembled did not exceed twenty, above the family of the occupier of the house, were, by this bill, exempt from all restrictions, but other places of religious worship were required to be registered at the quarter sessions, and held with open doors; and persons disturbing such assemblies were made liable to a heavy penalty. This bill passed without opposition.

§ Towards the close of the year 1811, a spirit of riot and insubordination had manifested itself in the county of Nottingham, which, in the course of the present year, extended to the counties of Derbyshire, Leicestershire, Lancashire, Cheshire, and Yorkshire, and, in some degree, pervaded all the manufacturing districts of England. The avowed and immediate object of the insurgents, who assumed the name of "Luddites," was the destruction of certain articles of machinery, the use of which had superseded or diminished manual labour, in the manufacture of the articles to which they were applied. In consequence of the report of the secret cummittee appointed by Parliament, on the subject, a bill was brought into the House of Commons, which made it a capital offence to administer illegal oaths; and the power of the magistrates in the disturbed districts was considerably enlarged. The exertions of the magistrates in Lancashire and Cheshire, had, early in May, filled the goals of those counties with prisoners; and in the interval between the spring and the summer assizes, special commissions were issued to try the offenders. Under each of the commissions numerous convictions took place for every gradation of offence; and of the capital convicts, eight at Lancaster, and two at Chester, suffered the penalty of the law.

the 25th of the same month, he crossed the Niemen—a river, which forms the line of demarcation between the Prussian and Polish territories; and, on the 28th he entered Wilna, the capital of Russian Poland. On the 29th of July, after various movements, Buonaparte entered Witepsk; on the 18th of August, he advanced towards Smolensko; on the 29th, he proceeded in the direction of Wiasma; and, on the 7th of September, he fought the bloody battle of Borodino, otherwise of Moskwa. A victory was claimed by each army; but the consequences established the claim of the Russians.* Immediately after the battle, Buonaparte found himself under the necessity of pushing on to Moscow, which he entered on the 14th of September; doubtlessly with the intention of fixing himself there for the winter. For some time, it was a contested point, whether Moscow were destroyed by the French or by the Russians; but every probability, and every circumstance of the case, seemed to favour the opinion, that it was a national sacrifice—the sacrifice of a city, for the preservation of an empire. "The conflagration at Moscow, that splendid example of patriotic ardour, (observes an eye-witness of the scene) was the voluntary act of the inhabitants. The Russian government had authorised its soldiers to set fire to some smaller places, such as Smolensko; but it would not venture on so great a sacrifice of the national wealth and dignity, as the destruction of Moscow; and was totally ignorant of the means by which it was effected, insomuch, as to be for a long time persuaded, that it was the act of the French. Neither had Count Rostopchin any thing else to do with this noble act than to set the example of destroying his own palace in the neighbourhood of Moscow, to which he set fire with his own hand, and burnt it to the ground, with the second library in the Russian empire."†

Through the entire progress of this campaign, Buonaparte appears to have been thwarted in his plans,

* At four o'clock, in the morning, the corps of Davoust and Prince Poniatowski, advanced by the wood which supported the Russian left; at six the action commenced, and the enemy experienced the advantages derived from the possession of a redoubt which he had taken on the 5th. Ney, in the mean time, bore down with great force on the Russian centre, and the Viceroy of Italy assailed the right. General as the attack seemed, the corps of Prince Bagration had to sustain the accumulated weight of nearly half the French army. The resolution of the enemy's cavalry on his flank, was conspicuous; they charged the Russians even to the batteries, and both cavalry and infantry were mown down by the cannon. For three hours this furious attack continued without effect; and Buonaparte, well aware of the importance of the station, ordered up reinforcements of troops, under Marshals Murat, and Count Caulaincourt, supported by 50 additional pieces of cannon. The vigour of the onset thus strengthened, was found irresistible, and Prince Bagration was compelled to fall back on the second line of the army, while the enemy turned against the retiring columns, the guns which had just been abandoned. Prince Kutusoff, seeing the left of his army thus overpowered, ordered up to its support, from the reserve, a strong body of cavalry and grenadiers; and, at the moment when they were making a desperate effort to regain their lost position, the militia and other troops, which had been posted in the wood, rushed forward, and took a dreadful vengeance on the enemy. The shock of this concentrated force obliged the French, in their turn, to give way, and Buonaparte had the mortification to behold the choicest of his troops driven from their dearly acquired conquests with immense loss. On the other extremity of the line, a combat scarcely less obstinate was maintained: Eugene Beauharnois made repeated efforts to carry the village of Borodino, and the redoubts by which it was protected; but his failure in all of them was complete, and he was ultimately repulsed with great loss. The Russian commander was now enabled to reinforce his centre, where the battle still raged with undiminished violence. The thunder of a thousand pieces of artillery, was answered by an equal number on the part of the French. A veil of smoke shut out the combatants from the sun, and left them no other light to pursue the work of death but the flashes which blazed from the cannon and musketry. The sabres of 40,000 dragoons met each other, clashing in the horrid gloom; and the moving ramparts of countless bayonets, bursting through the rolling vapour, strewed the earth with heaps of slain. Night at last arrived, and added to the sublime horrors of the scene. The return of day presented a scene calculated to appal the stoutest heart. The carnage on both sides was immense. The Russians estimated their own loss in killed and wounded, at 40,000 men, and that of the enemy at 60,000. The enemy, in putting in their claim to the victory, assert, that the loss of the French did not exceed 10,000, while that of the Russians, is estimated at from 40 to 50,000.

† On the 14th of September, at noon, the French army appeared in front of Moscow. The advanced guard, under the command of Murat, entered the gates with all the pomp and pride of conquest.—The troops moved towards the Kremlin, where a body of the self-devoted citizens had stationed themselves; but the "holy gate" was instantly forced, and the "sacred fortress," which, in the confidence of superstition, was held to be impregnable, became an easy prey to the invaders. Scarcely had the French troops entered the Kremlin, when Moscow appeared, at different quarters, in flames. The entry of Buonaparte was delayed by the expectation, that he should be met at the barrier, by the constituted authorities, and hailed as a conqueror; but this expectation being entirely disappointed, he entered the city on the 15th, in sullen silence, and took up his residence in the Kremlin. Immediately on his arrival, he directed that all the Russians who might be suspected of participating in the destruction of the city, by setting fire to its edifices, should be seized and brought to instant trial. One hundred of these unhappy persons were soon arraigned before the tribunal, and questioned as to their proceedings; but, though offered a free pardon on condition of divulging the nature and extent of the conspiracy, formed for the destruction of the city, they all remained silent; death had lost its terrors to them; and they received in succession the balls of the executioner, with no other emotion than that which was exhibited by each in a magnanimous contest to become the first victim. One of the buildings first consigned to the flames, was that vast mercantile pile, called the Exchange; numerous warehouses, containing every kind of merchandise, the productions of Europe and Asia, composed this edifice. The activity of the soldiery was never more visible—not in extinguishing the flames, that indeed was impossible, but in securing the plunder. No cry nor tumult prevailed in this scene of horror and destruction; every one found sufficient to satisfy his cupidity; and the falling roofs, and exploding combustibles, alone broke in upon the dreadful silence. On the morning of the 16th, a violent wind prevailed, which spread the flames in every direction. The whole extent of the capital, for many versts, seemed at length a sheet of flame. The immense tract of land about the river, which was formerly covered with houses, was one sea of fire; and the sky was hidden from the view by the tremendous volumes of smoke which rolled over this ancient city. The most heart-rending scenes now presented themselves; that portion of the population which had not abandoned the city, had concealed themselves in the interior of the houses; but, the fire having penetrated to almost every part of the town, forced them to quit their asylums.—The aged, borne down with grief, as much as with years, could hardly follow their families, and numbers of them, lamenting the ruin of their country, expired near the houses in which they drew their first breath. Parents, absorbed in the feelings of nature, were seen emerging from their places of concealment, saving nothing but their children from the universal wreck. The streets, public buildings, and particularly the churches, were filled with these unhappy people. Neither the accents of sympathy or lamentation were heard; both the conqueror and the conquered were equally hardened—the former from excess of fortune, the latter from excess of misery. The fire, which continued, soon reached the finest parts of the city. All those places which had been admired for the elegance of their architecture, and the taste of their furniture, were buried in the flames; many of the churches, with their beautiful steeples, resplendent as gold, disappeared; and the hospitals, which contained more than 20,000 wounded Russian soldiers, soon began to burn. This occasioned a most revolting and dreadful scene; almost all these poor wretches perished, and a few, who still lingered, were seen crawling half consumed among the smoking embers. "But how," says Labaume, a French officer from whom we quote, "shall I describe the tumultuous proceedings, when permission was granted to pillage this immense city! Soldiers, sutlers, galley-slaves, and prostitutes, were running through the streets, penetrating into the deserted palaces, and seizing every article which could gratify their avarice. Some were covering themselves with stuffs, of the most costly fabrics; others, without any discrimination, placed rich and costly furs upon their shoulders; and even the galley-slaves concealed their rags under splendid court dresses; the rest crowded into cellars, and forcing open the doors, drank the most costly wines, and carried off immense booty. This horrible pillage was not confined to deserted houses alone, but extended also to those which were inhabited. All the asylums were soon violated; and the cries of the miserable wretches who fell under the hands of the murderer, and the shrieks and groans of young females seeking protection against the brutal outrages of a licentious soldiery, added inexpressibly to the horrors of the scene. Napoleon, finding himself no longer safe in Moscow, the ruin of which had now become unavoidable, left the Kremlin, and established himself with his suite, in the imperial palace of Petrovsky, four versts from the city. It now became necessary, that the army should quit the ruins of Moscow, when a scene of the most dreadful confusion arose. A long line of carriages, loaded with plunder, was drawn through the streets of the capital. The soldiers, still stimulated by an ardent desire of pillage, ventured into the middle of the flames. They walked in blood, treading upon dead bodies, while burning fragments fell on their murderous heads. They would probably all have perished, had not an insupportable heat forced them at last to withdraw from the city, and take refuge in the camp. During the four days that the army remained at Petrovsky, Moscow never ceased burning. In the mean time, the rain fell in torrents: and the houses near the place being too few in number for the great multitude who were encamped there, it became impossible to obtain shelter, and men, horses, and carriages, bivouacked in the middle of the fields. Although it was forbidden to go into the city, the soldiers drawn there by hope of gain, betrayed their trust, and continually returned loaded with provisions and merchandise. Thus the French camp no longer resembled an army, but a fair, where the soldiers, metamorphosed into merchants, sold the most valuable articles, at an inconsiderable price; and, although encamped in the fields, and exposed to the injuries of the weather, by a singular contrast, they dined off china plates, drank out of silver vases, and possessed the richest and most elegant commodities of life, which luxury could invent."

and

and constrained to abandon the objects he originally had in view. To his early disappointments, in this respect—disappointments unquestionably produced by the judgment, perseverance, and physical superiority of the Russians—must be attributed his failure, and the consequent destruction of his army. It is generally understood, that Buonaparte's taking the road to Moscow, was an act of necessity, not of choice. St. Petersburgh, the seat of empire, was his aim; but the positions of the respective Russian armies, the flanking manœuvres which they practised, were such as rendered him incapable of pursuing a northern course. He therefore made a virtue of the evil, and turned eastward.—This circumstance, effected solely, as it has been observed, by the Russians, consumed the time, a point above all others, to be desired.

Pressed on all sides by the Russians; unprotected from the severities of a northern winter, and without the means of subsistence, Buonaparte found himself compelled, after having in vain offered peace to the Emperor of Russia, to quit the ruins of Moscow. That determination was carried into effect on the 19th of October; from which period, the retreat of his army towards the frontiers of Poland, was only an unbroken series of defeats, disasters, and miseries scarcely paralleled, amounting almost to annihilation.* From the time of his crossing the

* The passage of the Vope can never be forgotten. On the 7th of November, Platoff, and the light cavalry, were dispatched in pursuit of Beauharnois. On coming up with the enemy, near the village of Zezelia, the Hetman directed both these corps to be turned at the same time, while with a chosen squadron, he bore down himself upon the centre. Discomfited at every point, the division of Beauharnois fled in two parties, one towards Smolensk, and the other towards the Vope. Beauharnois, who had dispatched General Poitevin forward in the night, with a body of engineers, to construct a bridge for the passage of the army over the Vope, found to his extreme consternation, that a sudden rise in the water had swept away the bridge, at the moment when it was nearly finished. The Cossacks, apprised of this disaster, did not fail to advance in great strength; and the Viceroy, seeing that it was necessary that some officer of rank should set an example of courage, ordered Colonel Delfanti to place himself at the head of the royal guard, and to force the Vope. In obedience to this order, the Colonel, rushing into the river, at the head of the grenadiers, made his way through the masses of ice that floated down its stream. The Viceroy next followed with his staff, and on his arrival at the opposite bank, gave the necessary orders to facilitate the passage of the army. The waggons now began to file off; the first passed over with much difficulty; and, after them a few pieces of artillery: but, as the channel was far below the level of the ground, and the banks were steep, and covered with ice, the only practicable point was at a place where steps had been dug to descend to the river. The cannon all passing in the same track, formed indentions so deep, that it soon became impossible to drag them out. Thus the only accessible ford was soon choked up, and rendered utterly impassable for the rest of the artillery and baggage. Notwithstanding the efforts of the rear-guard, the Russians still continued to advance. The river was only half-frozen; and, as the waggons could no longer make any progress, it became necessary for those who had no horses, to throw themselves into the stream. A vast number of provision-waggons, carts, and drouschki, were abandoned, and the artillerymen, on the report that the enemy was fast approaching, spiked 100 pieces of cannon. The cries of those who were passing the river, the consternation of others who were preparing to descend, and who, with their horses, were every moment seen overwhelmed by the current, the despair of the women, the cries of the children, and the terror even of the soldiers, rendered this passage so horrible, that the very recollection of it yet terrifies those who witnessed and survived the scene. On the 7th, the loss of the French amounted to 1500 killed, and 3500 taken prisoners; on the 8th, in the words of Platoff, "the Cossacks killed a great many, but made few prisoners." The night of that day was truly dreadful. "To form some idea of it," says an eye-witness, "the reader must picture to himself an army encamped on the bare snow, in the midst of a Russian winter, closely pursued by the enemy, and having neither cavalry nor artillery to oppose him. The soldiers, without shoes, and almost without clothes, were enfeebled by famine and fatigue. Sitting on their knapsacks, they slept on their knees. From this benumbing posture, they rose but to broil some slices of horse-flesh, or to melt a few morsels of ice. Often they had no wood, and to find fuel they destroyed the houses in which their Generals lodged; sometimes, when they awoke in the morning, the village which they had seen the night before had disappeared; and towns, which to-day were untouched, would form, on the morrow, one vast conflagration." The Russians, habituated to the climate, and supplied with every necessary, scarcely felt the severity of the season: while the French and Italians, born in more genial climes, and unprepared for the intense rigour of a northern winter, sunk under its severity. Kutusoff, perceiving that Buonaparte designed to make a movement upon Krasnoi, pushed forward a strong body of troops, on the 16th of November, in order to intercept his advance: the French, aware of their danger, drew together strong bodies of troops, under the command of Davoust, and marched without interruption, into the vicinity of Krasnoi. Here the Russians suddenly attacked them at all points, and with their artillery, which had been placed in ambush, made dreadful ravages in the hostile ranks. The French fought desperately until night, when they were completely routed, and the whole division was either slain or dispersed among the woods on the banks of the Dnieper; their loss in killed was immense; two Generals, 58 superior officers, and upwards of 9000 soldiers, with 70 pieces of artillery, three standards, and the marshal's staff of Davoust, fell into the hands of the victors. This defeat, which annihilated the first corps of the French army, was only a prelude to one more fatal. Marshal Ney, ignorant of the events of the preceding day, was advancing from Smolensk towards Krasnoi, with the rear-guard of the French army. The Russian Commander-in-Chief, determining to cut off this division from the rest of the hostile forces, strongly reinforced General Millaradowitch. About three o'clock in the afternoon, the approach of the French was discovered, and a herald was dispatched to inform them, that the Imperial Guard had sustained a signal defeat on the preceding day, and to summon them to surrender. This summons the French Marshal treated with contempt, and immediately prepared for action. Under cover of a thick fog, he advanced to the very foot of the hill on which the Russians were encamped, when suddenly their batteries were unmasked, and such was the effect of the tremendous discharge of 40 pieces of cannon, and the whole musquetry of the line, that a flag of truce was sent to the Russian camp, and at midnight, nearly 12,000 French soldiers laid down their arms. On this day, 27 pieces of cannon were taken, together with immense booty. Favoured by the darkness of the night, Ney fled across the Dnieper, accompanied by a few hundred fugitives, who were actively pursued by clouds of Cossacks.—The Russians have divided the retreat of the French into three epochs, which besides the constant increase of their misfortunes, have each a peculiar character. The first ended at the battle of Krasnoi; the second, at the passage of the Beresina; and the third, at the Niemen. At the conclusion of the first period, at which we are now arrived, the Russians had already taken 40,000 men, 27 Generals, 500 pieces of cannon, 31 standards; and, besides the immense baggage of the French army, all the plunder of Moscow, that had not been destroyed. If to these losses are added 40,000 men, dead of fatigue or famine, or killed in the different battles, it will be found that the army, which quitted Moscow, with a force amounting to 110,000 men, was reduced to 30,000, including the Imperial Guard, of whom not more than 8000 combatants survived. The cavalry was almost extinct. In this situation, the soldiers formed mournful presages of what they had yet to endure, since they were scarcely half-way to the Niemen, and had three rivers to cross, and two mountains to climb. Nov. 18, was rendered memorable in the history of this campaign, by the arrival of Col. Czernicheff from the army of the Danube, at the head-quarters of Count Wittgenstein, after one of the most extraordinary marches on record. For his corps had to encounter, on every day's march, numerous bands of the enemy; but these he either eluded or overcame, frequently seizing their convoys, and destroying the escorts by which they were accompanied. In other respects, the march of Czernicheff was such as Russian troops only could have accomplished; he had many rivers to cross, and had no leisure to construct bridges, but he and his troops, even at that inclement season, plunged into the streams, and gained the opposite shores. On his arrival, he brought to Count Wittgenstein, the welcome intelligence of the flight of the Austrian and Saxon auxiliaries, the utter ruin of the French army, and the rapid advance of the Russians. A few days afterwards, the general Aid-de-Camp, Kutusoff, also arrived, and announced to the Count, that he was in communication with Platoff, and with the main army; in fact, that the whole force of the Russian empire was now in full communication; and that the circle was thus completely around the remains of the French armies. Buonaparte, finding his situation perilous in the extreme, was hastening by forced marches, with the remnant of his army, from Orcha towards the Beresina, hoping to effect his retreat to the Vistula by the way of Minsk; in which, by his orders, stores of all kinds, had been accumulated. But, in the mean time, Admiral Tscikakoff occupied that town, and detached his advanced-guard, under Count Lambert, to Borisov; on the 21st, this General attacked the tetes-du-pont on the Beresina, guarded by Dombrowski: and, after carrying the works by storm, and taking 3000 prisoners, destroyed the bridge of Borisov. Thus disappointed in his expectation of crossing the Beresina, Buonaparte, with the remainder of the army of Moscow, which having been joined by the skeletons of Victor's and Oudinot's corps, and by the different detachments that had been left on the Dnieper, now amounted to about 70,000 men, proceeded towards Minsk, along the right bank of the Beresina. On his rear and flank was the grand army, under Prince Kutusoff; on his right, was Count Wittgenstein, who had been joined by the northern corps; and in front, at Borisov, was the victorious division under Admiral Tschikakoff. During the 25th Buonaparte manœuvred to deceive the vigilance of the Russians, and by stratagem obtained possession of the village of Studzianca, where the Beresina is 40 toises or 80 English yards wide. Here, in the presence, and in the face of the opposition of the Russians, he constructed two bridges, one for cavalry, and the other for the passage of the infantry. Over these bridges Marshal Oudinot passed to attack the troops which resisted the advance of the French army. Napoleon having, with the assistance of his guards, forced his way through the immense crowd which now lined the banks of the Beresina, crossed that river about three o'clock in the afternoon of the 27th of November, taking the route towards Zembin. A large proportion of the French army, paralysed by their sufferings, and insensible of their approaching danger, passed the night of the 27th on the left bank of the Beresina. On the morning of the 28th, Count Wittgenstein arrived with the first division of the Russian army in the neighbourhood of Studzianca, and opened a dreadful cannonade upon the fugitives, who were pressing in such crowds over the bridges as completely to choke up the passage.

To

the Niemen, to that of the arrival of the wretched remnant of his army at Molodetschino, about 160 days elapsed.* That 300,000 human beings (French and Russians together, independently of sick and wounded) perished within that period — were sacrificed to the guilty ambition of a low-born usurper—is an estimate far too low. At that estimate, however, the loss will be found to average 1875 per diem! According to the most accurate calculation which there are data for forming, of the immense French force, mentioned by Lord Liverpool at 360,000 men, not 100,000 could be mustered at the close of the campaign. Buonaparte formed a "sacred" guard of his officers, deserted his army, left his men to perish, by the sword of the enemy, by famine,

: To add to the confusion and horrors of the scene, about eight o'clock in the morning the bridge for carriages and cavalry broke down, and the baggage and artillery, now advancing towards the bridge intended for the infantry, a scene of horror and contention arose exceeding all description. Numbers perished by the hands of their comrades, but a greater number were suffocated at the head of the bridge, and the bodies of men and horses so choked every avenue, that it was necessary to climb over mountains of dead bodies to arrive at the river. Some, buried in these horrible heaps, still breathed, and struggling with the agonies of death, caught hold of those who mounted over them. During this contention, the multitude which followed like a furious wave, swept away, and increased the number of victims. The French division of Parthonneaux, which formed the rear-guard of the army, having received orders to return, left a brigade to burn the bridge. These troops, having lost their way, wandered more than three leagues in a wrong direction. In the middle of a dismal night, and pierced with cold, they mistook the forces of the Russians for those of their own army, and ran to join their comrades; when seeing themselves surrounded, and without the least hope of escape, they were forced to surrender. While the troops under Marshal Victor were engaged on the left bank of the river, those under Marshal Oudinot were attacked on the right. Soldiers, who had before been wandering in confusion, fell into the ranks, and the battle was maintained with great obstinacy. Oudinot, who could only obtain the victory at the price of his own blood, was wounded at the beginning of the action, and being obliged to quit the field, the command devolved on Marshal Ney. The marshal having rallied his troops, the battle recommenced with great fury, and several pieces of cannon, and 4000 prisoners, were taken by the French.—But, it was in vain that they captured prisoners whom they could not retain; they fought not for victory, but for life. In the heat of the engagement, many balls struck the miserable crowds which were yet pressing to cross the bridge of the Beresina; some shells burst in the midst of them; and terror and despair took possession of every heart. The women and children, who had escaped so many disasters, seemed to have been preserved only to meet here a death the most deplorable. The artillery, the baggage-waggons, the cavalry, and the infantry, all pressed on to escape the cannon and musketry in their rear, each endeavouring to gain the opposite bank by passing before the other. The strong made their way by casting the weak into the river, or trampled under foot the maimed and the sick that interrupted their passage. Hundreds were crushed to death by the wheels of the cannon; others, hoping to save themselves by swimming, were frozen in the middle of the river, or perished by placing themselves on pieces of ice, which, overweighted, sunk in the stream; and thousands of victims deprived of hope, threw themselves into the Beresina, and perished in the waves. The division of Girard made its way, by force, through all the obstacles that retarded its march; and climbing over the mountains of dead bodies that obstructed the way, gained the other side; thither the Russians were pressing to follow them, when they hastened to effect their escape by setting fire to the bridge. At this moment the unhappy beings still on the left side of the Beresina, abandoned themselves to absolute despair. Crowds upon crowds still pressed towards the burning bridge, choking up the passage amid bursting flames, scorched and frozen at the same instant, till at length the whole sunk with a tremendous crash, into the bosom of the Beresina. On the frightful night of the 28th, the elements, let loose, seemed to conspire to afflict universal nature, and to chastise the ambition and the crimes of men. The conquerors and the conquered, were alike overwhelmed with suffering. Between the 25th and the 29th of November, upwards of 20,000 French soldiers fell into the hands of the Russians; 200 pieces of cannon were abandoned, and the passage of the Beresina was, in its consequences, more terrible than the most sanguinary battle. After the passage of the Beresina, Buonaparte finding Minsk already occupied by the Russians, was compelled to take the more circuitous route of Wilna; and, in order to cover his retreat, the wretched fugitives who formed the wreck of his once stupendous army were collected near Kamen. This movement had been anticipated by the enterprising Wittgenstein, who, having dispatched Count Kutusoff, the general aid-de-camp, by a more distant route, proceeded himself, on the enemy's right flank, to intercept his retreat. Both these plans were crowned with complete success: the whole body of the Bavarians, under General Wrede, which formed the remains of the 6th corps, and were on their march to join the main French army, were taken in detail by Count Kutusoff; and Napoleon, finding himself cut off from Vileika, abandoned his project of advancing to Wilna in that direction, and took the road by Molodetschino. Here, however, he was exposed to the attacks of Tschikakoff, whose force, impatient to give the final blow to the retreating army, was hovering on his flanks. On the 29th, they bore down upon the French; who, notwithstanding the efforts of the commanding officers to re-animate their exhausted and dispirited troops, were at length obliged to retreat in disorder. Early in the morning of the same day, 2000 Cossacks fell upon the advanced guard of the 4th corps of the French army, with their usual "Hourra!" and slaughtered great numbers of them in the streets of Kamen. On the 1st of December, the retreating army arrived at Ilija, and on the 2d at Molodetschino.

* From Molodetschino, the memorable "Twenty-Ninth Bulletin," which may be considered as the French official account of the retreat from the Moskwa to the Wilna, was issued, in the following terms:—

"Molodetschino, December 3, 1812.

"To the 6th of November, the weather was fine, and the movement of the army was executed with the greatest success. The cold weather began on the 7th; from that moment, we every night lost several hundred horses, in consequence of bivouacking. Arrived at Smolensk, we had already lost many cavalry and artillery horses. The Russian army from Volhynia, was opposed to our right: our right left the Minsk line of operations, and took for the pivot of its operations, the Warsaw line. On the 9th, the Emperor was informed, at Smolensk, of this change in the line of operations, and conceived what the enemy would do. However hard it appeared to him to put himself in movement during so cruel a season, the new state of things demanded it. He expected to arrive at Minsk, or at least upon the Beresina, before the enemy; on the 13th, he quitted Smolensk; on the 16th he slept at Krasnoi. The cold, which began on the 7th, suddenly increased; and on the 14th, 15th, and 16th, the thermometer was 16 and 18 degrees below the freezing point. The roads were covered with ice; the cavalry, artillery, and baggage horses, perished every night, not only by hundreds, but by thousands, particularly the German and French horses. In a few days, more than 30,000 horses perished; our cavalry were on foot; our artillery and our baggage were without conveyance. It was necessary to abandon and destroy a great part of our cannon, ammunition, and provisions. This army, so fine on the 6th, was very different on the 14th—almost without cavalry, without artillery, without transports. Without cavalry, we could not reconnoitre a quarter of a league's distance; without artillery, we could not risk a battle, and firmly await it; it was requisite to march, in order not to be constrained to a battle, which the want of ammunition prevented us from desiring; it was requisite to occupy a certain space not to be turned, and that too without cavalry, which led and connected the columns. This difficulty, joined to the cold, which suddenly came on, rendered our situation miserable.—Those men, whom nature had not sufficiently steeled to be above all the chances of fate and fortune, appeared shaken, lost their gaiety, their good humour, and dreamed but of misfortunes and catastrophes; those whom she has created superior to every thing, preserved their gaiety, and their ordinary manners, and saw fresh glory in the different difficulties to be surmounted.

"The enemy, who saw upon the roads traces of that frightful calamity which had overtaken the French army, endeavoured to take advantage of it. He surrounded all the columns with his Cossacks, who carried off, like the Arabs of the desert, the trains and carriages which separated. This contemptible cavalry, which only make a noise, and are not capable of penetrating through a company of voltigeurs, rendered themselves formidable by favour of circumstances. Nevertheless, the enemy had to repent of all the serious attempts which they wished to undertake: they were overthrown by the Viceroy, before whom they were placed, and lost many men.

"The Duke of Elchingen, with 3000 men, had blown up the ramparts of Smolensk: he was surrounded, and found himself in a critical position, but he extricated himself from it with that intrepidity by which he is distinguished. After having kept the enemy at a distance from him during the whole of the 18th, and constantly repulsed him, at night he made a movement on the right, passed the Borysthenes, and deceived all the calculations of the enemy. On the 19th, the army passed the Borysthenes at Orcha: and the Russian army, being fatigued, and having lost a great number of men, ceased from its attempts. The army of Volhynia, had inclined, on the 16th, upon Minsk, and marched upon Borisov. General Dombrowski defended the bridge-head of Borisov, with 3000 men. On the 23d, he was forced and obliged to evacuate this position. The enemy then passed the Beresina, marching upon Bobr; the division, Lambert, formed the advanced-guard. The second corps, commanded by the Duke of Reggio, which was at Tacherein, had received orders to march upon Borisov, to secure the army the passage of the Beresina. On the 24th, the Duke of Reggio met the division, Lambert, four leagues from Borisov, attacked and defeated it, took 2000 prisoners, six pieces of cannon, 500 baggage-waggons of the army of Volhynia, and threw the enemy on the right bank of the Beresina. General Berkeim, with the 4th cuirassiers, distinguished himself by a fine charge. The enemy could only secure his safety by burning the bridge, which is more than 300 toises in length. Nevertheless the enemy occupied all the passages of the Beresina: this river is 40 toises wide, and had much floating ice on it, but its banks are covered with marshes 300 toises long, which present great obstacles in clearing it. The enemy's General had placed his four divisions at the different debouches, where he presumed the French army would attempt to pass. On the 26th, at break of day, the Emperor, after having deceived the enemy, by different movements, made during the day of the 25th, marched upon the village of Studzianca, and caused in spite of an enemy's division, and in its presence, two bridges to be thrown over the river. The Duke of Reggio passed, attacked the enemy, and led him, fighting, two hours. The enemy retired upon the tete-du-pont of Borisov.—General Legrand, an officer of first-rate merit, was badly, but not dangerously wounded. During the whole of the 26th and 27th, the army passed.

"The Duke of Belluno, commanding the 9th corps, had received orders to follow the movement of the Duke of Reggio, to form the rear-guard, and keep in check the Russian army from the Dwina, which followed him. Parthonneau's division formed the rear guard of this corps.

famine, or by cold; and literally fled, in disguise, to Paris.*

Russia exerted herself in the cabinet, as well as in the field; as, in the course of the year, she effected peace with Britain, with Sweden, with Spain, and with Turkey. To Britain she gave the most substantial proof of her sincerity, by charging her with the protection of her naval force.

America, as already stated, declared war against England, on the 18th of July. The compliment was not returned till the 13th of October, hope having been entertained until that period, that the American government might have been induced by the repeal of the British Orders in Council, to revoke its hostile declaration. The conduct of the Americans, however, was distinguished by shuffling and prevarication; whilst the error of the British ministry, from the commencement of the dispute, was marked by an excess of concessions, and conciliatory proposals. The progress of the land war, on the part of the Americans, displayed nothing but imbecility, failure, and defeat. On the 16th of August, General Hull's entire army, exceeding 2500 men, with 33 pieces of ordnance, intended for the conquest of Canada, surrendered to the British; and, on the 13th of October, a second army, repeating the attempt on Canada, was completely defeated, 900 prisoners being taken, and the remainder either killed or wounded. The English loss, on the first occasion, amounted to only 18 killed and wounded; and, on the second, with the exception of Sir Isaac Brock, who was killed previously to the actual commencement of the battle, their loss was also very slight. At sea, the Americans were more successful; a circumstance to be ascribed chiefly to the great superiority of their frigates, in size, (nearly equal to British 74's) weight of metal, and number of men. Their advantage, in the capture of the Guerriere, by the Constitution, consisted only in an accession of fame, for the Guerriere was burnt; but, in their subsequent capture of the Macedonian, the prize was carried, in a sound state, into an American port. Ministers were much censured, by the opposition, for a want of foresight in not being prepared with a more efficient naval force to contend with the Americans. Several ships of the line were afterwards ordered out.

The naval force of France was in so reduced a state, that scarcely any thing remained to be done. In February, however, the Victorious, Captain Talbot, took the Rivoli, of 74 guns, in the Adriatic; in March, the Rosario sloop, Captain Harvey, in company with the Griffon, defeated a French flotilla, of 13 sail, 6 of which were destroyed or taken, off Boulogne; and, in

* "On the 27th, at noon, the Duke of Belluno arrived with two divisions at the bridge of Studzianca. Parthonneaux's division set out at night from Borisov. A brigade of this division, which formed the rear-guard, and which was charged with burning the bridge, marched at seven in the evening, and arrived between ten and eleven o'clock: it sought its first brigade and its General, who had departed two hours before, and which it had not met with in its route. Its researches were in vain; some uneasiness was then conceived. All we have since been able to learn is, that the first brigade set out at five o'clock, missed its way at six, went to the right in place of proceeding to the left, and marched two or three leagues in this direction; that during the night, and benumbed with cold, it rallied at seeing the enemy's fires, which it mistook for the French army. Thus surrounded, it was taken. This cruel mistake must have caused us a loss of 2000 infantry, 300 cavalry, and three pieces of artillery. Report states, that the general of division was not with his column, and had marched alone.

"All the army having passed on the morning of the 28th, the Duke of Belluno guarded the tete-du-pont upon the left bank: the Duke of Reggio, and behind him all the army, was upon the right bank. Borisov having been evacuated, the armies of the Dwina and Volhynia communicated; they planned an attack on the 28th at break of day. The Duke of Reggio caused the Emperor to be informed that he was attacked. Half an hour afterwards, the Duke of Belluno was on the left bank. The Duke of Elchingen immediately followed the Duke of Reggio, and the Duke of Treviso, the Duke of Elchingen. The battle became warm. The enemy wishing to turn our right, General Doumere, commanding the 5th division of cuirassiers, which made part of the 2d corps that remained on the Dwina, ordered a charge of cavalry, by the 4th and 5th regiments of cuirassiers, at the moment when the legion of the Vistula was engaged in the woods, to pierce the centre of the enemy. The enemy was defeated and put to the rout, together with his cavalry, which came to the assistance of his infantry. Six thousand prisoners, two standards, and six pieces of cannon, fell into our hands. On his side, the Duke of Belluno vigorously charged the enemy, defeated him, took from 5 to 600 prisoners, and did not suffer him to advance within reach of the cannon of the bridge. General Fournier made a fine charge of cavalry. In the battle of the Beresina, the army of Volhynia suffered much. The Duke of Reggio was wounded, but his wound is not dangerous. He received a ball in his side.

"The next day, the 29th, we remained on the field of battle.—We had to make our choice between two routes—that to Minsk, and that to Wilna. The road to Minsk led through the middle of a forest, and of uncultivated marshes, where it was impossible for the army to subsist itself. On the other hand, the road to Wilna led through a very fine country. The army being without cavalry, deficient in ammunition, and horribly fatigued by 50 days' march, carrying in its train all the sick and wounded of so many battles, stood greatly in need of getting to its magazines.

"On the 30th, the head-quarters were at Pletchinichou; on the 1st of December, at Slaike; and, on the 3d, at Molodetschino, where the army received the first convoys from Wilna. All the wounded officers and soldiers, and whatever else could be of embarrassment, with the baggage, &c. were sent off to Wilna.

"To say that the army stands in need of re-establishing its discipline, of refreshing itself, of remounting its cavalry, completing its artillery, and its materiel—this is the result of the exposé which has just been made. Its repose is of the first necessity. The materiel and the horses are coming in; General Boureir has already more than 20,000 remount horses in different depots.

"The artillery has already repaired its losses. The generals, officers, and soldiers, have suffered greatly from want. Numbers have lost their baggage by the loss of their horses, and several by the effect of the Cossacks' ambushes. The Cossacks have taken numbers of isolated persons, of geographical engineers, who were taking positions, and of wounded officers, who were marching without precaution, preferring running the risk, to marching slowly, and going with the convoy.

"The report of the General officers commanding the different corps, will make known what officers and soldiers have chiefly distinguished themselves, and the details of these memorable events.

"In all these movements the Emperor has been continually marching in the middle of his guards—the cavalry, commanded by the Duke of Istria, and the infantry commanded by the Duke of Dantzic. His Majesty has been well satisfied with the fine spirit shewn by his guards. They have always been ready to shew themselves wherever their presence was needful: but circumstances have always been such that their appearance alone was sufficient, and that they never were in a situation which required them to charge. The Prince of Neufchatel, the grand marshal, the grand equerry, and all the aides-de-camp, and military officers of the household, have always accompanied his Majesty. Our cavalry was dismounted to such a degree, that it was necessary to collect the officers, who had still a horse remaining, in order to form four companies of 150 men each.

"The Generals there performed the functions of Captains, and the Colonels those of subalterns. This sacred squadron, commanded by General Grouchy, and under the orders of the King of Naples, did not lose sight of the Emperor in all those movements. The health of his Majesty was never better."

* Quitting Molodetschino at midnight, on the 3d of December, Buonaparte proceeded to Smorghoni, where he called together the chiefs of his army, and after having appointed Murat his lieutenant general, took his departure from that place, incognito, on the 4th, accompanied by and under the name of the Duke of Vicenza. On his route to the French capital, he travelled in a single sledge, passing rapidly from Wilna, through Warsaw, to Dresden; whence he pursued his journey through Leipsic and Mentz, and arrived in Paris at midnight, on the 18th of December. His presence had kept the chiefs, in some degree, to their duty; but, when the fact of his departure became known, many of the officers abandoned the remains of the regiments committed to their command. Till that time, some armed soldiers still rallied round the standard which they had sworn never to forsake; but, from the moment they were deprived of their chiefs, unheard of calamities reduced their numbers. The division, Loison, which had arrived from Konigsberg, and the Neapolitans from Wilna, having been obliged to encamp in cold 22 degrees below the freezing point, were almost annihilated, and out of 6000 men, of which each division was composed, only some feeble battalions remained, who, on their junction with the main army, ran on the road in a state of distraction, or fell down without being able to rise again. Those who could support the fatigue of marching, prolonged their griefs; but if, weary of life, they wished to terminate their existence, it was only necessary to stand still, and the frost would become their executioner. The roads, in every direction, presented at every step, brave officers, covered with rags, supported upon sticks, their hair and beards stiffened by the ice; these warriors, who, but a short time before, were the terror of their enemies, and the conquerors of two-thirds of Europe, could now scarcely obtain a look of pity from soldiers whom they had formerly commanded. Misfortune having equalised conditions, every thing was confounded. The colonel who had no food, was obliged to beg from a private soldier. Thus the man who possessed provisions, although he were a servant, was surrounded by a crowd of courtiers, who to obtain food, threw aside their rank and distinction, and condescended to caress him. On the 7th, the French army advanced to Joupranoui, and on the 8th to Ochmiana. The route was still covered with soldiers, so deplorably reduced, that the Russians disdained to make them prisoners. Some had lost the sense of hearing; others, their speech; and many, by excessive hunger and cold, were reduced to a state of frantic stupidity, which made them roast dead bodies for nourishment, or consume their own hands and arms. Suffering had driven many mad, who threw themselves into the fires and perished in the flames; and, every day's march presented a repitition of these horrible scenes.

May, the Northumberland, Captain Hotham, destroyed two French frigates and a brig, under the batteries of the Isle of Groa.

A. D. 1813.] In the north of Europe, the year 1813 opened as auspiciously as the preceding year had closed. Numerous French levies were ordered, but victory continued to crown the exertions of the allies. One of the first events of importance which occurred, was the surrender, or rather defection, of the Prussian General, D'Yorck, who entered into a convention with the Russian commander, Wittgenstein. That convention, the King of Prussia, then within the grasp of Buonaparte, refused to ratify; but, no sooner had he freed himself from the apprehension of peril—no sooner did he perceive that there was a chance of emancipation for himself, and for his country—than he conferred the most distinguished approbation upon D'Yorck.

Advancing in the year, a Russian envoy was dispatched to Vienna; the Russians obtained possession of Hamburgh; an Austrian ambassador arrived in London; and Sweden, by landing a considerable force in Swedish Pomerania, struck the first decisive blow against the French. During the three first months of the year, Buonaparte strained every nerve to recruit his armies; or, more properly speaking, to create new ones. By the 3d of April, decrees had been passed for levies to the amount of 535,000 men; and it was then estimated that he would have 400,000 on the Elbe, 200,000 in Spain, and 200,000 partly on the Rhine, and partly in Italy. On the 15th of April, he left Paris; "the Empress Maria Louisa having first been declared Regent of the French Empire, till the moment when victory should return the Emperor." Previously to this, the King of Prussia had issued an edict, abolishing the continental system; the Emperor of Austria was understood to have formed the resolution of taking part against France, unless Buonaparte should listen to his offer of mediation; and the Crown Prince of Sweden, over whose intentions some clouds of doubt yet hung, had resolved to place himself at the head of the Swedish armies.

About this time (April) a Danish mission arrived in England. For a while, the hope was indulged, that the relations of peace between Britain and Denmark would be restored; but, in consequence of the demands of Denmark being such as could not be acceded to, or, according to other accounts, in consequence of the cession of Norway to Sweden, being demanded by this country, the negociation failed.

The campaign opened with several advantages gained by the allies. On the 2d of May was fought the great battle of Lutzen; in which the French claimed the victory, admitting their own loss to have been 10,000 men, and stating that of the allies at 25 or 30,000.* The allies, however, kept possession of the field of battle, and fired a round for victory, and, according to their statement, their loss was only 8 or 10,000 men, while that of the French was estimated at 12 or 15,000. The allies afterwards retreated; but their retreat was slow, and orderly, unmarked by the confusion of a discomfited army. Another dreadful battle, or rather a succession of battles, took place on the 19th, 20th, 21st, and 22d of May, the result of which, according to their own accounts, was, that the French lost between 11 and 12,000 men in killed and wounded, and two pieces of cannon; that they took from the allies 10,000 wounded, and 19 cannon; and that they advanced about thirty miles, the allies retiring before them, unbroken and formidable, into the Prussian territory. These engagements were fatally ominous to Buonaparte. In the action of the 21st, he was deserted by a part of the Saxon, and of the Wirtemberg troops; and, on the 22d, the celebrated Marshal Duroc was killed.

Buonaparte now listened, or affected to listen, to the propositions

* The French forces at this time assembled on the scene of action were estimated at 170,000 men. On the 25th of April, Buonaparte arrived at Erfurt, whence he ordered all the divisions of his army to move in the direction of Leipzic. A sharp battle took place on the 1st of May, on the plains between Weissenfels and Lutzen, in which the French claimed the advantage. The first cannon ball which was fired on this day, struck the wrist of Marshal Bessieres, pierced his groin, and killed him instantly. On the morning of the 2d Napoleon advanced at the head of his army into the plain of Lutzen, with the view of reaching Leipzic, and throwing himself upon the rear of the allied armies. To defeat the object of this movement, the whole of the allied forces suddenly crossed the Elster, and commenced a grand attack upon the enemy. The contest that ensued was one of the most sanguinary description. The Russians and Prussians fought under the command of General Wittgenstein, in the presence of the Emperor of Russia and King of Prussia, and the French under Buonaparte. The left of the French army formed by the viceroy, having under his command the 5th and 11th corps, leaned upon the Elster. The centre was commanded by Marshal Ney, in the village of Kaja. Buonaparte, with the young and old guard, was at Lutzen; and Marshal Marmont, who commanded the right, was placed at the defile of Poserna. In the order of battle formed by the allies, General Blucher formed the first line; the corps formerly belonging to Count Wittgenstein, the second; and the corps of General Winzingerode, together with the Russian guards and grenadiers, the reserve. The position occupied by the French was remarkable for its strength; behind them was a rising ground, and a succession of villages; in front there was a hollow way, through which ran a stream of considerable depth; and thus supported in front and rear, they awaited the attack of the allies. These advantages were much increased by an immense quantity of ordnance, which was distributed through the line, and in the vallies; besides batteries in the open country, supported by masses of infantry in solid squares. The allies had the advantage in cavalry, but the superiority of numbers was on the side of the French. The villages of Gross-Gorschen, Klein-Gorschen, Rahno, Kaja, and Starrsiedef, occupied by the French, are in the vicinity of each other, and form a kind of irregular square; and the plan of the allies was, by directing the principal weight of their attack against the right wing of the enemy, to take these villages and to occupy them with an advanced-guard. With this concentration of force it was their intention to throw back the right wing of Napoleon from the direct road to the Saale, and with their numerous mass of cavalry, to turn this wing by a furious charge on his flank and rear, and thus to decide the fortune of the day. The battle commenced at noon, by the attack of the village of Gross-Gorschen. From three to four batteries were erected within 800 yards, and the village was heavily cannonaded. The enemy's battalions, which were drawn up before the village, supported the fire with distinguished firmness, but the Prussian brigade advanced with so much steadiness and impetuosity, that the French were at length driven from their position. From this moment, all the corps came successively into action, and the battle became general. The village of Gross-Gorschen was disputed with unexampled obstinacy; six times it was taken and re-taken by the bayonet, and at last remained in the hands of the allies. For several hours the conflict was dubious; and the discharges of musketry raged with such indescribable destruction, that the number of killed and wounded in this part of the field was immense. The artillery was gradually brought forward by the hostile armies, on a field of about 1,500 yards square, intersected by villages, hamlets, meadows, and ditches, and slaughter in all its horrors reigned triumphant. The enemy, determined, if possible, to regain possession of the captured villages, brought up continually numerous bodies of fresh troops, and at last obtained a superiority of numbers so decided, as to oblige the weakened battalions of the allies to evacuate Klein-Gorschen. This success was only temporary; the Prussians, again led on and inspired by their generals, profited by some fortunate changes in the French cavalry, and Napoleon was once more deprived of his precarious advantage. Obstinate as was the contest on the wings, the great efforts of the infantry, cavalry, and artillery took place in the centre. The village of Kaja, which formed the pivot of the French position, was taken and re-taken several times. In the afternoon of this sanguinary day Eugene Beauharnois came up with his corps, and entered the French lines at the moment when Marshal Macdonald was attacking the Russian reserve. The allies now redoubled their efforts; the French centre gave way; some of their battalions fled in disorder, and the village of Kaja, was again taken. Buonaparte now ordered Marshal Mortier to march with sixteen battalions of the young guards to the disputed village of Kaja, which, after an ardent contest, was again carried, and passed into the hands of the French. The allied armies, though, on the whole, they had the advantage of the day, were too much weakened by the conflict, to be able to maintain their ground. They, therefore, resolved to make good their retreat, with as little sacrifice as possible. On the 3d they marched to Borne and Altenburg; on the 4th to Rocklitz and Colditz; and on the 7th they crossed the Elbe, taking the road to Bautzen.

Buonaparte followed up his original plan of pushing on to Leipzic, whence he advanced to Dresden, and entered that city on the 8th of May.

† Whilst the French remained at Dresden, their army received considerable reinforcements, so as to form a mass little short of 200,000 men. The Prussian and Russian reinforcements, under Bennigsen, Tolly, Langeron, Sass, and Kleist, had also arrived in the meantime, and the total amount of the combined force was estimated at 150 to 180,000 men. The allies had taken up a position with the Spree in their front; their right extending to fortified eminences which defended the debouches from that river—Bautzen, which had been intrenched and covered by redoubts, forming their centre; and their left was supported by mountains covered with wood, and running parallel to the course of the Spree. Where the ground was open, particularly in the centre, strong works had been thrown up; and behind the first position, at the distance of 6,000 yards, other works of equal strength had been constructed.

Buonaparte, who had joined his army before Bautzen on the morning of the 19th of May, spent the whole of that day in reconnoitring the strength and position of the allies. Count Wittgenstein, having penetrated Buonaparte's intention in detaching Ney and Lauriston to the left, resolved to counteract the design by attacking them separately.

proposition for a Congress to be holden at Prague, for negociating a general peace; and, in pursuance of that object, a suspension of hostilities was agreed upon on the 1st of June; and, on the 4th, an armistice, to continue on all points till the 20th of July, was finally concluded and ratified—hostilities not to recommence without six days notice. At the "request" of Austria, who appears to have been the prime mover in this affair, the armistice was prolonged till the 10th of August. Every attempt at negociation, however failed; and, on the 17th, agreeably to notice, hostilities again commenced. Austria, having signed a treaty, by which she became a member of the grand alliance, having for its object the recovery of the independence of Europe, had issued a declaration of war against France; and at the different interviews which, during the armistice, had taken place between the respective Sovereigns and their ministers, it had been determined that the Crown Prince of Sweden should be invested with the chief command of the combined forces.

Various movements and affairs of posts, took place immediately on the renewal of hostilities; but it was not until the 27th of August, that a general battle was fought. In the engagement of that day—designated as the battle of Culm—General Vandamme, and other Generals, the whole of Vandamme's staff, several officers of rank, 6 standards, 60 pieces of artillery, and 10,000 prisoners were taken. On the preceding day, General Blucher had taken 50 pieces of artillery, 30 tumbrils and ammunition waggons, and above 10,000 prisoners, and, renewing the contest on the 27th and 28th, he took 30 more pieces of cannon, and 5,000 prisoners. The loss of the French was also increased, and the allies proportionately strengthened, by the desertion of two Westphalian regiments, during the principal battle. In the action of the 27th fell the gallant, the unfortunate Moreau! He had arrived at Gottenburgh, from America, only at the latter end of May; and, proceeding to the head quarters of the allies, he was appointed to the high station of Major-General of the allied rately, before they were sufficiently advanced to co-operate with the main army. With this view, General Barclay de Tolly was ordered to advance on the 19th to Koningswarta, where he fell in with part of Lauriston's corps under General Pery, amounting to 9,000 men, and after a severe battle, forced the town at the point of the bayonet, took 1,500 prisoners, and seven pieces of cannon, and put the enemy totally to rout. At the same time, the troops under Marshal Ney were vigorously attacked by General D'Yorck, who, with inferior numbers, made a gallant stand, and at the close of the day retired with General Barclay de Tolly to the positions which they were appointed to hold in the great battle that was now approaching. On the 20th, at eight o'clock in the morning, Buonaparte appeared on the heights in the rear of Bautzen, and at noon the French columns under Marshals Oudinot, Macdonald, Marmont, and Soult, were ordered to advance and pass the Spree. At noon these corps advanced on Bautzen, and attacked, under the cover of a brisk cannonade, the advanced-guard of the allies, commanded by Generals Milloradowitch and Kleist. The determination of Kleist to defend the heights situated on the side of Bautzen, occasioned a desperate combat. He had to withstand a force, which, according to the Russian account, was four times as strong as his own; and yet he maintained his position till four o'clock in the afternoon, and did not give way till he had resisted the most vigorous attack, from these superior numbers, both on his right flank and on his front. The obstinacy with which the Russian Generals Rudiger and Roth, and Colonel Marcoff, defended these heights, excited also the admiration of the whole army. While the attack was made on this point, another was made by the enemy on the centre and left of the allies; but here again he was vigorously received by Count Milloradowitch, and Prince Eugene of Wirtemberg, and repeatedly repulsed. Notwithstanding this gallant resistance, the enemy gained ground, and after a desperate cannonade, of six hours' continuance, the French General Compans entered Bautzen. Oudinot soon after gained possession of the heights, and at seven o'clock in the evening the allies were driven back to their second position; but Soult and Bertrand, who were sent to dispossess them of the heights on the right, failed in their object; and Ney, Lauriston and Regnier, who were ordered to pass the Spree, and turn the right flank, were equally unsuccessful. At eight o'clock in the evening Buonaparte entered Bautzen, but the battle was continued till ten at night, and the advantages gained by the enemy in this day's engagement were purchased by the loss of at least 6,000 men. At daybreak on the 21st the allied army was attacked in their position in advance of Wurschen and Hochkirch, two small towns of Lusatia, on the eastern side of the Spree, between Bautzen and Goerlitz. This ground, selected by the allies to resist the enemy's approach on the great roads to Silesia and the Oder, was bounded on the left by a range of mountains, through which Marshal Daun marched in the year 1757 to the battle and victory of Hochkirch. The line of the allied army, which extended between three and four miles, was formed by the corps of General's Kleist and D'Yorck in echellon on the right; General Blucher's, Count Wittgenstein, and General Milloradowitch's, formed the left; while the guards and grenadiers, with all the Russian cavalry, were stationed in reserve in the centre. The enemy's first efforts were directed against the two principal points of the allied position, under Barclay de Tolly and General Blucher, and after these attacks had been opened by the sharp-shooters and artillery, he gradually displayed his whole force down the entire extent of the line. Buonaparte was now visible on a commanding spot, directing the battle; and from the eminences of the allied centre a full view was presented of the enemy's columns marching over the heights to the right and left of Bautzen. These masses of troops might be estimated at from 30 to 40,000 men, who, were scarcely drawn up in order of battle, when pillars of smoke were seen rising from the high grounds to which they had advanced. This fire was the signal of attack, for Marshal Ney and General Lauriston, who instantly pressed forward with about 30,000 men, and threw themselves with great impetuosity on General Barclay de Tolly's position at Glein. A desperate engagement ensued, which raged with undiminished fury till ten o'clock in the morning, at which hour Marshal Ney, who had carried the position of Prulitz, was attacked by the allies, and driven back from that village. The conflict in the mountains was at the same time carried on with redoubled animosity; but the inflexible spirit and steady fire of the allied battalions, under the direction of the Prince of Wirtemberg and General Milloradowitch, prevented the enemy from making any progress in this quarter, and cost him an inconceivable number of men. The enemy now seemed to menace an advance in the centre, and the cannonade in that quarter became tremendous. General Blucher, finding that the important position held by General Barclay de Tolly was again threatened, resolved to part with the only reserve he had at his command, and ordered this brigade to march to the village of Krekwitz. These dispositions were scarcely made, when the enemy attacked General Blucher himself in the whole extent of his position; and the action at this time had taken a very unfavourable turn. Two Russian batteries, the one by Krekwitz, the other by Nieder Gurke, that formed the principal defence of the centre, had expended all their ammunition; and the enemy, by superior numbers, had made himself master of the heights behind Nieder Gurke, from which it was found impossibe to dislodge him. In this situation General Blucher demanded reinforcements, and General D'Yorck was ordered up to secure the execution of his dispositions; but the required succour came too late, and the two brigades of General Blucher's front gradually withdrew themselves out of their centre position to the high grounds above Krekwitz. But here not a single tenable position could be found, and as it was already perceived that the commander-in-chief began to despair of any favourable issue to the contest, General Blucher ordered his reserve cavalry to draw back across the defile, that the retrograde movement which he now contemplated might not meet with any impediment. It was now an hour after noon, and the centre of the allied army was yet untouched, but the enemy began to make demonstrations, and had opened a brisk cannonade in that quarter. Buonaparte seizing this crisis of the battle, marched with the guards, General Latour Maubourg's four divisions, and a great quantity of artillery, upon the right flank of the position of the allies, and the division of Morand and Wittenberg carried the ground which formed their point d'appui. At three o'clock in the afternoon, and while the event of the battle still seemed dubious, a heavy firing was heard along a line of three leagues, which served to announce that the allies had begun their retreat. At seven o'clock in the evening Marshal Ney and General Lauriston arrived at Wurtchen, and Marshal Marmont, after occupying all the intrenched villages and redoubts which the allies had evacuated, advanced in the direction of Hochkirch, and thus took the whole of the left of the retreating army in flank. Ever since the opening of the campaign, the policy of the allies had been rather to break off a battle before it was ended, if its tendency were obviously unfavourable, than to risk every thing by exposing themselves to the chance of a total defeat; and as the contest in the battle of the 21st, had actually taken an unfavourable turn, they availed themselves of their undisputed superiority in cavalry to secure their retreat. This movement was made in the face of day, with the most perfect order and regularity, in two columns. On the 22d the allied armies continued their retreat, and were pursued by the French to the heights in the rear of Ruckenback, where the combat was renewed, chiefly between the cavalry of the two armies. In the early part of the day the pursuers were repulsed, but, to the astonishment of the allies, the French were enabled to bring up more than 15,000 cavalry, and thus to turn the fortune of the day in their favour. At seven o'clock in the evening, Marshal Duroc, the Duke of Friuli, and the Grand Chamberlain of France, being on a small eminence, in the neighbourhood of Goerlitz, along with Marshal Mortier and General Kirgener, one of the last balls fired by the allies struck the ground close to Marshal Mortier, dreadfully lacerated the lower extremities of Marshal Duroc, and killed General Kirgener on the spot. Duroc felt that he was mortally wounded; in less than twelve hours he expired. On the 23d, at nine o'clock in the morning, General Regnier entered Goerlitz; and while one part of the French army advanced into Silesia, another took the route towards Berlin. On the 24th, Ney, Lauriston, and Regnier, forced the passage of the Neiss, and on the 25th that of the Queiss. The allied armies in their retreat seemed to have deviated from the direct line towards the Oder, and to have moved upon Schweidnitz; this change in the direction of their retreat was probably occasioned by their desire to occupy the strong places of Silesia, and by a hope that Buonaparte would not dare to follow them so far into that country. In this, however, they were mistaken, for the pursuit was so rapid, that within ten days from the battle of Bautzen one division of the French allied army. To his judicious advice, respecting the plan of the campaign, much credit was given.* On the 29th General Blucher again defeated the enemy; taking General Putton prisoner, with 20 eagles, and 22 pieces of cannon.

Advancing in the career of victory, the Crown Prince, early in September, atchieved a signal victory over Buonaparte's favourite, Marshal Ney, alias the Prince of Moskwa. On that occasion, the loss of the enemy was mentioned at from 16,000 to 18,000 men, 3 standards, upwards of 50 pieces of cannon, and 400 ammunition waggons.† From the recommencement of hostilities, down to this period, the entire loss of the enemy, was estimated at upwards of 100,000 men, and 250 pieces of cannon.

Feeling the severity of their losses, an extraordinary sitting of the French Senate was holden on the 4th of October, the Empress Maria Louisa attending in person. The object of this sitting was, to pass a decree for another levy of 280,000 men.

But France had yet greater, severer losses to sustain, The defection of the King of Bavaria, and his junction with the allied powers; the defeat—the total rout of Buonaparte, on the 15th, 16th, 18th, and 19th of October, with the loss of 120,000 men, and 120 pieces of cannon were yet to be proclaimed to the world.—In this last and decisive action, during the heat of the conflict, 17 battalions of German infantry, with all their staff, and two regiments of Westphalian hussars, with 22 pieces of artillery, came over to the allies.‡

army had advanced one hundred miles into Silesia; the blockade of Glogau, one of the important keys of the Oder, was raised; and the French had obtained possession of Breslau, the capital of Silesia.

* When Buonaparte entered Dresden from Silesia, at eight o'clock in the morning of the 26th of August, the grand Russian, Prussian, and Austrian army, commanded by the sovereigns, were before that city. The allied army at that time crowned all the hills which surround Dresden, and had approached upon the left bank of the Elbe, to the distance of a league from the French posts. At noon all was tranquil. At four o'clock in the afternoon, six columns of the allied army, each preceeded by 50 pieces of artillery, descended into the plain, and marched towards the French redoubts. In less than a quarter of an hour afterwards the fire became terrible, and one of the redoubts was silenced. At five o'clock a part of the French reserve was engaged, and several shells fell in the town. Roused to the greatest exertions by the urgency of the danger, Buonaparte ordered Murat to march with General Latour Maubourg's cavalry upon the right flank of the allies, and at the same moment, four divisions of the young guards debouched through the gates of Pirna and Plauen. The effect of these efforts was to force the allies back from the centre to the extremity of their position, and to cover the field with the dead. On the 27th the weather was dreadful, and the rain fell in torrents. At nine o'clock in the morning the battle was renewed, and the allies determined if possible to drive the French from the city. But it was soon perceived that it would be impossible to effect a practicable breach in the walls, and at two o'clock in the afternoon, the allied army, finding themselves in danger of being surrounded and cut off from their communication with Bohemia, resolved upon a retreat. The French having thus succeeded in repulsing the assailants, marched out of the city on the morning of the 28th, to harass them in their retreat. Buonaparte, availing himself of the perilous situation in which he had placed his enemies, ordered an immense number of cannon to be brought out of the city, and the battle was renewed by a heavy cannonade on both sides, accompanied by charges of cavalry. After several hours, the French army, perceiving that they could make no impression, withdrew into Dresden; and the allies retreated into the valley of Toplitz, in Bohemia.

General Moreau received a mortal wound from a cannon fired by the French imperial guard on the 27th, while that General was in earnest conversation with the Emperor of Russia, and which, passing through the horse, carried off both his legs. This dreadful wound did not immediately prove mortal; he was removed from the field of battle on a litter, made of Cossack's pikes, and after undergoing repeated operations, died on the 3d of September, at Laun, in Bohemia.

† The allies having retired from before Dresden, Buonaparte found himself at liberty to dispatch a strong force towards Berlin, and Marshal Ney, at the head of 70,000 men, was appointed on that service. After the repulse of the French on the 23d of August, the Crown Prince, finding that he was not opposed by an equal force, determined to take advantage of his superior numbers, and moved towards the Elbe with the intention to cross that river, and to march upon Leipzic. But on his arrival at Rabenstein his march was arrested by the intelligence that the enemy, under Marshal Ney, was in full march upon Juterbock, and that the Prussian army under General Bulow, which did not exceed 40,000 men, was threatened with an immediate attack. On the receipt of this intelligence the Crown Prince changed his route, and arrived at Juterbock, by forced marches on the 6th of September, at the moment when the Prussian army, after having sustained the unequal combat with distinguished gallantry for several hours, was nearly overpowered by numbers. For a moment the Russians and Swedes halted, for the purpose of forming in order of battle; and as soon as this was accomplished 70 battalions, and 10,000 horse, supported by 150 pieces of artillery, advanced in columns to the attack, preceded by 4,000 Russian and Swedish cavalry, who advanced at full speed, for the purpose of supporting some points against which the principal efforts of the enemy were directed. At the sight of this immense army coming up to the assistance of a foe against whom the enemy had scarcely made an impression, the French first wavered, and then fled with precipitation. In their retreat they were charged by the numerous cavalry of the allies with so much impetuosity that their ranks were broken, and the utmost disorder ensued. The enemy after their defeat, attempted in vain to rally.

‡ During the month of September, which was principally occupied in military movements, the allied forces had been augmented by the arrival of General Benningsen, at the head of a Russian corps of 40,000 men. Platoff, the Cossack chief, re-appeared, and his warriors formed part of General Benningsen's corps, which joined the grand army in Bohemia. This seasonable reinforcement determined the leaders of that army to make a movement on the left, and, ascending from Bohemia, to interpose between Dresden and the communication with the Rhine. Platoff, with his Cossacks, led the advance, and vanquished a French corps, under General Lefebvre, which had been dispatched to clear the road from Dresden. The allied army, in quitting the Bohemian frontier, proceeded in three divisions towards Leipzic, the force of the Russians and Prussians amounting to 90,000 and the Austrians to 100,000 men. The armies of the Crown Prince and General Blucher, amounting together to 130,000 men, made a combined movement on the 5th of October in the direction of Leipzic, and by the 9th the whole of the combined armies formed a line in Buonaparte's rear, stretching from Dessau to the Bohemian mountains. Never perhaps was a military operation accomplished by so extensive and simultaneous a movement. The allies had now effected their great preliminary design, and it is impossible not to admire the skill, boldness, and energy, displayed upon this occasion.

Bavaria had long been the ally of France; but she had been treated as a vassal; a superior Austrian corps, under Prince Reuss, had already entered the Bavarian territory; and the French army assembled on the Maine, and from which Buonaparte had promised assistance to Bavaria, had been ordered to repair to the Elbe. Maximilian Joseph, therefore suddenly determined to dissolve all the ties which united him to France, and to afford to the cause of the allies his full and cordial co-operation. A treaty of alliance and concert between Austria and Bavaria was accordingly signed by Prince Reuss and General Wrede, on the 8th of October; and the Bavarian General with 35,000 Bavarian troops and 25,000 Austrians under his command, immediately communicated with the combined armies. In this state of affairs, Buonaparte was reduced to the necessity of commencing his retreat, and on the 7th of October he quitted Dresden, accompanied by the royal family of Saxony. His march was not directed upon Leipzic, but upon Wittenburg; Berlin seemed to be his ulterior object, and the utmost alarm seized that capital. The Crown Prince, and General Blucher, determined to follow close in his rear, to be ready to assail him at any point against which he might direct his operations. With this view, they re-crossed the Saale and the Elster, and were preparing to gain the right bank of the Elbe, when they learned that a complete change was observable in the movements of the enemy. It now appeared that the French division which had passed the Elbe, and threatened Berlin, had been recalled, and that all the different corps were moving in the direction of Leipzic. On the 15th of October Buonaparte arrived at Leipzic, and found that place still in the possession of his troops; but the city was surrounded by hostile armies. The united force of Blucher and the Crown Prince extended on the north from Mulda to the Saale; and the army of Silesia communicated along the Saale with the grand army, which extended to the south from that river to the Mulda. According to this disposition of the allied forces, the two armies touched each other at the extremities, and though they were separated at other points, yet even their opposite lines were so nearly in contact that they could communicate by signals, and hear distinctly the sound of each other's cannon. The 10th of October, the day immediately following the arrival of Napoleon, was fixed upon by Prince Schwartzenberg, for a general attack on all the French positions round Leipzic. On the north the French divisions under Ney, occupied a line about four miles in extent, stretching from Leipzic along the roads to Dessau and Magdeburg. The army of the Crown Prince of Sweden formed the left of the opposite line, reaching from Wetten to Zarlug. On the right, nearer Leipzic, was General Blucher, with his head-quarters pushed to Gross Kirgal, and it was determined that on this side the grand effort should be made. At mid-day a furious onset was made by the Prussian cavalry, which dislodged the enemy from the advanced villages which they had occupied; but they tenaciously held the woody ground on their right, and maintained themselves in the villages of Mockern and Mokau, on the left of their position. In the former of these villages a bloody contest ensued. Five times it was taken and re-taken by General D'Yorck, but at length the victorious Silesians carried all before them, and drove the French force beyond the banks of the Partha. The Russians, equally with their brave allies in arms, made the most gallant efforts in the villages of Great and Little Wetteritz; and the loss of the French in this battle, was 40 pieces of cannon, 12,000 killed, wounded, and prisoners, one eagle, and many caissons; while the loss of the allies did not exceed 7,000 men. Whilst this contest was raging to the north of Liepzic, a separate, and still more furious battle, was fought on the south, between Prince Schwartzenberg, who was advancing towards Leipzic by the road of Lutzen, and that portion of the French army which was commanded by Buonaparte in person. The attack was made by the allies at eight o'clock in the morning, and the principal operations took place on the side of Wachau and Liebertwolkwitz. At eleven o'clock

Mac-

The result of this affair was, that Buonaparte again deserted the shattered remains of his army, and fled to Paris, which, as a contemporary writer observes, he entered with the assured confidence of a bully, not with the noble firmness of a hero. The immediate consequences of this grand overthrow of the Tyrant were great and glorious,

Marshal Macdonald showed himself in advance before Holzhauzen, and, in conjunction with General Lauriston, succeeded in forcing General Count Klenau to evacuate the position he had occupied near Gross Possna. Count Klenau, having obtained reinforcements, ordered a succession of attacks to be made on the enemy at Seyfartshayn and Gross Possna, and these posts were, in the course of the day, taken and re-taken several times. On the side of Wachau, the enemy, aided by fresh troops, pressed forward with so much vigour, that the Prince of Wirtemberg was obliged to make a retrograde movement; and Prince Schwartzenberg, being apprized that Buonaparte was making his great effort in this quarter, immediately ordered up into line the whole of the Austrian reserves. At the moment that the Austrian reserve cavalry, under General Nostitz, was debouching in advance of Grobern, the French dragoon-guards and Polish cavalry, under General Letori, had already penetrated to the vicinity of that village, and several of the battalions of infantry, drawn up in square masses, were following in close order. In this emergency General Nostitz charged the enemy's cavalry at the head of three regiments of Austrian cuirassiers; and the charge was made with so much energy that the cavalry was broken, and several squares of French guards, put completely to the rout. Napoleon, finding all his attempts to gain ground in this quarter frustrated, now determined to repeat his attacks upon the Prince of Wirtemberg; and for this purpose, the corps of cavalry under General Latour Maubourg, headed by the King of Naples, was brought into action. In this quarter the French infantry greatly out-numbered the Russians, and the allies had only ten squadrons of light cavalry on the spot. The enemy, favoured by the nature of the ground, advanced to the charge with impetuosity, and were actually on the point of breaking through the confederate army and cutting off the right wing, when the Emperor Alexander, perceiving the critical situation in which the army was placed, and fully aware of the disastrous consequences that would ensue, ordered, at this decisive moment, the reserve of the Cossack guards to charge the enemy. The charge was irresistible; and the French horse were broken and dispersed; twenty-four pieces of captured cannon were retaken, and the disasters of the day were retrieved. On the approach of night, both parties desisted from hostilities. The 17th was occupied by the French in replacing the 80,000 cannon balls which had been fired on the preceding day, and by the allies in bringing up their reinforcements. On the 18th, Prince Schwartzenberg determined to execute the designs of the allied sovereigns, and to bring the fate of Europe to its final crisis. At two o'clock in the morning Buonaparte was upon the field. He approached within two leagues of Leipzic, and stationed his army, the right of Connewitz, the centre at Probstheyda, and the left at Sletteritz villages to the south-east of the city, placing himself in the mill of Ta.

The grand army of the allies, which was under arms by the dawn of day, was divided into three columns: the first, under the command of General Benningsen, received orders to proceed from Seyfartshayn in the direction of Holzhausen; the second, commanded by General Barclay de Tolly, was destined to advance against the heights of Wachau; and the third, under the Prince of Hesse-Homburg, formed the reserve.

Prodigious as were the efforts made on this day by the confederate army, to make an impression on Buonaparte's line of positions, the conflict was marked by no particular feature, nor distinguished by any bold manœuvre, or striking vicissitude: physical force supplied the place of military skill, and a series of regular assaults, bloody and obstinate, seem to have formed the general characteristic of the battle of Leipzic. At three o'clock in the afternoon, victory still hovered between the two armies; when a brigade of Saxon cavalry, the light artillery of the 7th corps, and a battalion of Saxon light infantry, with a brigade of Wirtemberg cavalry, under General Normann, finding themselves on the point of being charged by the Russian cavalry, marched hastily forwards, the infantry shouldering their firelocks, and the cavalry sheathing their swords, passed over to the allies! The Saxon corps posted in Paunsdorf no sooner heard of this event, than they took the same resolution; and although the Saxon General Zeschau exerted his utmost efforts to detain his troops in the French ranks, the whole of the 1st brigade, consisting of eleven battalions of infantry, three squadrons of cavalry, and three complete batteries of heavy artillery, followed the example of their brethren in arms, and made the cause of the confederates their own. This defection, at so critical a moment, not only caused an opening in the French lines, but gave up to the Crown Prince the important debouch confided to the Saxon army, which carried its hostilities to such a height as immediately to turn its 40 pieces of cannon against General Durett's division. Disorder now prevailed in the French ranks; the allies established themselves on the left bank of the Partha, and soon advanced within half a league of Leipzic. Buonaparte instantly dispatched General Nansouty, with twenty pieces of artillery, to take in flank the troops which were advancing along the Partha to attack Leipzic, while he himself was seen on the field proceeding in haste with a division of his guards to the village of Reudnitz, to oppose General Langeron. The promptitude of these movements re-established order in the French army; but the appearance of General Count Bubna at Molkau arrested the progress of Nansouty, and obliged him to forego his intention of outflanking the advanced column of the allies. From some unaccountable delay, the Swedish artillery had not arrived upon the field, but the Crown Prince found a substitute in the cannon of the Saxons, which, being supported by a battery of Congreve's rockets, mowed down the ranks of the enemy, and contributed materially to their repulse. Buonaparte, from his post at Reudnitz, pushed forward a division of his guards to the support of Marshal Marmont, who now succeeded in forcing Count Langeron to retire from his position at Schonfeld. The Crown Prince, perceiving the inequality of numbers by which General Langeron was pressed and obliged to retreat, ordered the Swedish General Cardell to advance with twenty pieces of cannon; and thus reinforced, Langeron was enabled towards the close of the day to retake the village. Blucher, though he took no prominent part in the battle of Leipzic, contributed by his dispositions to promote the fortune of the day. Perceiving that the enemy was sending off troops in his rear on the road to Weissenfels, he detached General D'Yorck with his whole corps, on the evening of the 18th, towards Halle, in hopes that on the left bank of the Saale he might reach Weissenfels before the enemy. The approach of night put a stop to the operations of the conflicting armies. To add to the embarrassment of Buonaparte, Generals Sorbier and Dulauloy repaired to his bivouac in the evening, to inform him, that in the course of the day 95,000 cannon-balls had been fired; that the ammunition in reserve was exhausted; and that there remained only 16,000 cannon balls, which would scarcely suffice for a cannonade of two hours, after which no ammunition would remain for ulterior events; that the army had in five days fired 220,000 cannon balls, and that a further supply could only be obtained at Magdebourg or Erfurt. This state of things rendered an immediate retreat indispensible, and Buonaparte determined to march upon Erfurt, for the same reason which induced him to march to Leipzic. The evening had scarcely closed when the French army began to defile, and the whole of the night of the 18th was occupied in the retreat. Buonaparte, with the main body of his guards, remained in the vicinity of Leipzic till the morning of the 19th, when the victorious army of the confederates made every preparation to storm his last strong hold. At nine o'clock the bombardment commenced. The Emperor of Russia, and the King of Prussia, had scarcely joined the army in front of Leipzic, when a Saxon officer with a flag of truce arrived, and, in the name of the magistracy, requested that hostilities might be suspended for the purpose of arranging a capitulation. The messenger was received by the Emperor Alexander in person, who announced to him that his request could not be granted; and the preparations for the assault were continued with undiminished alacrity; when a second flag of truce appeared from Marshal Marmont, with an offer to deliver up the remainder of the Saxon troops, if the French might be permitted to retire unmolested, and the city spared a bombardment. These proposals being made only to gain time, were rejected, and the general attack had already begun. General Sacken, who had advanced to the north side of the city, carried the intrenchments in front of the Halle gate after a severe action; but a galling fire of grape shot still retarded his advance, till General Langeron, by order of General Blucher, filed off a body of troops for his support through the meadows of the Partha, and after forcing the enemy to abandon the gate, entered the city as conquerors. The northern army commenced its operations towards the east; and the Crown Prince ordered General Bulow to attack and occupy Leipzic in that direction. The gates were defended with great bravery, but nothing could withstand the Prussian bayonet; the French gave way in all directions, and notwithstanding all their attempts to rally in the streets, the intrepid Prussians bore down all opposition, and became masters of the eastern division of the town. About the same time the advanced-guard of General Benningsen's army entered the city, and after a severe engagement in some of the avenues, put the enemy completely to the rout. The immense quantity of baggage, artillery, and equipages of every description, relinquished by the French army in their precipitate retreat, had choked up every street, gate-way, and outlet; and the retreating army exhibited a chaos of confusion that cannot be described, while each individual sought in flight his personal safety. Obstinately as the French defended themselves, they were unable to withstand the iron masses of the assailants. They were overthrown in every quarter, and finally driven out of the city. Buonaparte did not quit Leipzic till ten o'clock in the morning, only a few minutes previously to the victorious entrance of the allies. Before his departure, he had ordered the engineers to form a mine under the grand bridge between Leipzic and Lindenau, with directions to blow up the bridge when the French troops had all marched over, and thus to retard the advance of their pursuers. This duty, by a neglect on the part of Colonel Montfort, was confided to a corporal and four sappers, who upon hearing the first shot discharged from the ramparts of the city, set fire to the mine, and blew up the bridge. When this explosion took place, the whole of the rear-guard of the French army, under Marshal Macdonald and Prince Poniatowski, were still on the Leipzic side of the river, with a park of eight pieces of cannon, and several hundred waggons. A cry of dismay soon spread through the ranks on the approach of the troops to that river—"The enemy are close upon our rear, and the bridges are destroyed;" was heard on every side. The soldiers dispersed, and were all either killed, wounded, or taken prisoners; Marshal Macdonald swam across the river; but Prince Poniatowski, less fortunate, plunged into the Elster, and sunk never more to rise.

The results of the battle of Leipzic were immense and decisive. The allied armies took fifteen general officers; among them Generals Regnier and Lauriston, commanding corps d'armée. The body of General Dumorestier was found in the river, and more than 1,000 men perished in the stream; and 250 pieces of cannon, 900 caissons, and about 15,000 prisoners, including the King of Saxony, and all his court, fell into the hands of the allies, besides several eagles and colours. The enemy abandoned more than 23,000 sick and wounded, and his total loss exceeded 60,000 men. According to calculation, Buonaparte, was not able to save from the general disaster more than from 75 to 80,000 troops.

The allied monarchs, proceeding from different quarters, at the head of their guards, made a solemn entry into Leipzic about mid-day on the 19th of October, and met in the great square of that city.

glorious, beyond all hope and calculation. The house of Orange was reinstated in Holland;* Hanover and Brunswick were restored to their rightful sovereigns; the Confederation of the Rhine was dissolved; the Rhine itself was passed by the allies,† and the "sacred territory" of France laid open to its very frontier. To these might be added a general revival of trade throughout Europe.

The first steps of Buonaparte, after his arrival at Paris, were, to throw an oppressive weight of taxation upon the people, and to decree a new levy of 300,000 conscripts. Thus, at the lowest calculation, 1,110,000 of the youths of France were ordered to be dragged from their homes, from the arms of their parents and relations, within a year, to be sacrificed at the shrine of unprincipled ambition. Shortly after the issuing of the French Senatus Consultum for the new levy just mentioned, the allied powers promulgated a declaration offering peace to Buonaparte, on the liberal basis of guaranteeing to the French Empire "an extent of territory, which France under her Kings never knew." On this basis, Buonaparte professed himself willing to treat; and a Congress was therefore expected to assemble at Manheim, to negociate a general peace. It was the desire of Buonaparte, that, during the negociation, an armistice should be proclaimed; but, to this the allies very prudently refused to assent.

In the south of Europe, the progress of the allied arms this year, was equally gratifying. Spain and Portugal were almost cleared of the enemy; the sittings of the Cortes were transferred to Madrid; "the intrusive King," like his great brother, was again compelled to seek his safety in flight; and the victorious Wellington, having passed the Pyrenees, planted the British standard on the sacred territory of France.

In the month of April, General Murray with an inferior force, defeated Marshal Suchet, near the Veilein; the French having upwards of 1,000 killed, and losing a proportionate number in wounded and prisoners. The total loss of the allies, in killed, wounded, and missing, was only between 6 and 700. On the 26th of May, Lord Wellington entered Salamanca, the French precipitately evacuating the city on his approach. On the day following, the French, apparently fearful of being cut off by the rapid advance of the allied army, commenced a hasty evacuation of Madrid, and of all the posts in its vicinity. Lord Wellington continued to advance, the French flying before him, in every direction. On the 13th of June, the enemy blew up the inner walls of Burgos, fled from that fortress, and, rapidly continuing their retreat, abandoned the whole of the country to the Ebro, which General Graham immediately passed. Lord Wellington's next laurels were gathered on the plains of Vittoria; where, on the 21st of June, his Lordship obtained a complete victory over the French army commanded by Marshal Jourdan. The enemy lost 115 pieces of cannon, 415 waggons of ammunition, all their baggage, provisions, Buonaparte's retreat was such as might have been expected; a powerful army was behind, and clouds of Cossacks and other light troops were far advanced before him; his line of march from the Saale to Fulda was strewed with artillery, baggage, and every species of military wreck; and the more effectually to impede his movements, the Bavarian army, amounting to 35,000 men, had placed themselves at Hanau, near the banks of the Maine. On the arrival of Napoleon at Erfurt, on the 23d, he halted for two days, to re-organize and refresh his exhausted army. To the neighbourhood of this city he was pursued by Blucher, who concluding that Buonaparte would endeavour to cross the Rhine at Coblentz, had advanced in the direction of that city. Relieved by this movement of the Silesian army from the apprehension of being placed between two fires, Buonaparte advanced by rapid marches upon Hanau, where he turned the whole of his remaining force against the Bavarians. General Wrede resolved to sustain the unequal contest; but after a well contested battle, of eight hours duration, he was compelled to give way; and on the evening of the 31st the head-quarters of the French army were established at Francfort. On the 7th of November Buonaparte crossed the Rhine at Mentz, with the remnant of his German army, leaving behind him all his conquests, and with them his towering hopes of universal dominion.

* During the spring and summer of the year 1813, Holland remained tranquil; and the French government seems to have been lulled by this tranquillity into a state of delusive confidence. However, when the intelligence of the result of the battle of Leipzic began to transpire, the confederates at the Hague, amounting to 100 in number, judged that the time had arrived to emancipate their country, and as one of the first steps towards effecting their object, they determined to enlarge their number by the addition of a respectable body of their fellow citizens. With this view, each of the confederates engaged to select from among his friends four individuals, who, without any mutual concert or knowledge of each other, should engage to be ready whenever called upon to obey the command of the friend by whom each was selected. Thus they formed a band of 400 respectable adherents, selected chiefly from among the burghers of the town, and held together by the terms of friendship, patriotism, and mutual security. At the head of this band stood Count Styrum; and the services of the inhabitants of Schœveningen, a village on the coast, about a mile from the Hague, were secured by the influence of an inhabitant of that place, of the name of Pronck. No measures were taken to influence the people, for none were necessary, it being perfectly clear that their good will and co-operation might be depended upon the moment leaders were presented to them in whom they could confide. Count Styrum, whose zeal, courage, and activity, were remarkable, soon succeeded in gaining over the whole of the Dutch national guard at the Hague, consisting of 300 men, along with their Colonel (Tulling), who conducted himself with so much circumspection as to retain, to the moment of the explosion, the confidence of the French prefect. On the 15th of November, the populace being already in a state of great fermentation, a mob was collected at Amsterdam, which immediately proceeded to burn the wooden huts in which the douaniers, or excise officers, levied the duties, and to pillage the house of the receiver of the customs, who refused to take down the French arms. This tumult, which had the appearance of being accidental, succeeded in terrifying the French authorities, who on the next day quitted the town; and from this period, the corporation, and the more opulent part of the inhabitants, of Amsterdam, who had hitherto resisted the idea of a counter-revolution, attached themselves to the popular cause. On the next a proclamation was issued, in which four and twenty citizens were called on by name to assume the administration of affairs, and the government of the city passed into their hands. No sooner had the intelligence of the insurrection at Amsterdam reached the Hague, than Count Styrum was immediately appointed governor by the confederates, in the name of the Prince of Orange. An instrument was also drawn up, summoning a meeting of those persons who had been members of the states of Holland in the years 1794-5, and this meeting was appointed to take place on the following day. A proclamation was then addressed to the Dutch people, which was received by the people with every demonstration of joy; an orange flag was hoisted on the tower of the Hague, and similar emblems were suspended from almost every window in the town. On the 27th M. Fagel arrived from England, with a letter from the Prince of Orange to M. Van Hogendorp, who, with M. Maasdam, had been appointed, on the 21st, to the general administration of affairs at the Hague. On the 30th, the Prince of Orange, accompanied by Lord Clancarty, arrived off the Dutch coast, and in the course of the day effected a landing off Schœveningen, under a royal salute from a small English fleet off that station. The day was remarkably fine, the beach was covered with spectators, and the cry of Orange boven! was heard in every direction, accompanied by the most enthusiastic demonstrations of joy.

On the 3d of December, the Prince of Orange, accompanied by the English embassy, made his entrance into Amsterdam, where he was received with enthusiastic plaudits, and proclaimed by the title of William I. Sovereign Prince of the Netherlands. This proclamation was followed by the levy and organization of an army of 25,000 men; and the rapid progress of the allied armies completed the triumph of Dutch independence.

† While the grand allied army directed its march towards the Rhine, and on the 5th of November established their head-quarters at Francfort, the Crown Prince, with the army of the north, liberated his Majesty's Hanoverian dominions from the presence of the French armies.

On the 4th of December, the corps of the Prince Royal's army moved forwards towards the Strecknitz; and on their arrival on the banks of that river, Marshal Davoust shut himself up in Hamburgh, leaving the right wing of the Danes posted at Oldeslohe. The Crown Prince now marched upon Lubec, which city soon capitulated; and from thence directed his operations against Danish Holstein. An attempt was made by the government to raise the militia in this province, but the inhabitants refused to arm against the allies, and the conquest of Holstein became inevitable. The fall of Gluckstadt speedily followed the invasion of Holstein; and Denmark, finding all further resistance unavailing, separated her interests from France, and negociated a treaty of peace with Sweden and Great Britain. By this treaty Norway was surrendered to Sweden, in return for which Denmark was to receive Swedish Pomerania. Britain, on her part, agreed to restore to Denmark all the conquests made from that country, with the exception of Heligoland, in consideration of which the Danes were to join the allies with ten thousand troops, on receiving a subsidy from this country of 400,000*l.*

Whilst the negociations were in progress between the allied powers and Denmark, Marshal Davoust exercised the most tyrannical conduct towards the inhabitants of Hamburgh. The funds of the bank, with all the private property deposited in that institution by the citizens, were seized and confiscated; every species of oppression and injustice was practised towards the inhabitants, and thousands of them, were expelled from the city, because it was not in their power to accumulate a stock of provision on which they could subsist for six months.

The battle of Leipzic was soon followed by the fate of Dresden, and General St. Cyr, with the garrison of 16,000 men, were made prisoners of war, and marched into Russia. Buonaparte now proposed to treat for the surrender of all the fortresses on the Elbe, the Oder, and the Vistula; but as the consequence of any arrangement of this nature would have been to restore an army of upwards of 50,000 men to France, the proposal was deemed inadmissible, and rejected by the allied sovereigns.

BATTLE OF VITTORIA.

treasure, &c. and the French Commanders' baton of a Marshal of France.* Lord Wellington continued the pursuit, and, on the 25th, took the enemy's only remaining gun.—The battle of Vittoria was celebrated in England by general illuminations, and by splendid fetes at Carlton House and Vauxhall. In Spain, medals were struck upon the occasion. The Cortes, also, by an unanimous vote, decreed a territorial property to Lord Wellington, in testimony of the gratitude of the Spanish nation.

So sensibly was Buonaparte affected by this defeat of Jourdan, that he immediately superseded that officer in the command, and appointed Soult to succeed him, with the title, or rank, of "Lieutenant-General of the Emperor"—an honour never before conferred upon any of Buonaparte's Generals. Previously to his joining the army, he issued a proclamation, stating, that His Imperial Majesty's instructions, and his own intentions were, to drive the allies across the Ebro, and to celebrate the Emperor's birth day in the town of Vittoria! Soult, though the "Lieutenant General of the Emperor," was destined, in his turn, to acknowledge the superiority of British prowess. From the 25th of July to the 2d of August, a series of engagements took place between Soult's army and that of Lord Wellington, the result of which was the defeat, and the retreat of the enemy, from the Spanish frontiers into France, with a loss of from 15,000 to 20,000 men, 4,900 of which were prisoners.

On the 31st of August, the town of St. Sebastian's, which had been invested shortly after the battle of Vittoria, was carried by storm, Soult, in a desperate attempt to relieve that town, is said to have lost 1,000 men. The fortress held out till the 8th of September, when it surrendered by capitulation.

On the 7th of October, the allied army crossed the Bidassoa, and planted the British standard in France. Pampeluna, the siege of which Lord Wellington had left to the care of the Spanish General Don C. D'Espana, surrendered on the 31st of October, a circumstance which relieved Lord Wellington from every apprehension respecting his rear, and enabled him to concentrate and dispose of his forces at pleasure—On the 9th 10th 11th 12th and 13th of December, Soult—who intended to drive the allies across the Ebro, and to celebrate Buonaparte's birth day in the town of Vittoria, sustained another series of defeats on the banks of the Adour. Immediately after the action, three German regiments, apprised of the important changes which had taken place in the northern parts of the Continent, went over in a body to the allies.

To this brilliant, and almost unprecedented tissue of successes, the only alloy was the sudden embarkation of General Murray, from Tarragona, in June, an extraordinary and unfortunate circumstance, which excited much chagrin in the country.†

This year, the war with America was conducted with much bitterness and malignity, on the part of the

* Vittoria was the central depot of the French, in the frontier provinces. Here Joseph Buonaparte, having Marshal Jourdan as his Major-General, had taken up a position in front of the city. On the 20th the two armies were in presence of each other. The French had their left wing stationed on the heights between Arunez and Puebla d'Arlanson, their centre on a height which commanded the valley of Zadora, and their right wing resting upon Vittoria. Lord Wellington, having determined to dislodge the enemy from these positions, commenced the attack on the following day by a successful movement made on the part of Sir Rowland Hill, who at the beginning of the action drove the enemy from the important heights of Puebla, and took possession of Subijana de Alava. The French Generals soon became sensible of the importance of the position they had lost, and Joseph Buonaparte and Marshal Jourdan repaired in person to encourage the troops to regain the village of Subijana; but all their efforts proved unavailing, and after an arduous contest, Sir Rowland Hill remained master both of the village and the heights. During this conflict the Hon. Lieutenant-Colonel Cadogan, an officer of distinguished zeal and tried gallantry, fell at the head of his regiment, and General Murillo was seriously wounded, but refused to quit the field. The 4th and light divisions passed the Zadora immediately after Sir Rowland Hill had obtained possession of the Subijana de Alava, the former at the bridge of Nauclaus, and the latter at the bridge of Tres Puentes; while the 3d division, under Sir Thomas Picton, crossed the bridge higher up the river, and was followed by the 7th, under the Earl of Dalhousie. These four divisions, forming the centre of the allied army, were destined to attack the heights on which the right of the enemy's centre was placed; while Sir Rowland Hill should move forward from Subijana to the attack of the left. The enemy, having weakened his line to strengthen his detachment on the hills, abandoned his position in the valley, and commenced his retreat in the direction of Vittoria, towards which city the allied troops continued to advance in good order, notwithstanding the difficulty of the ground. Sir Thomas Graham, who commanded the left of the army, consisting of the 1st and 5th divisions, and Generals Pack and Bradford's brigades of infantry, with the brigades of cavalry under Generals Bock and Anson, moved forward from Margina towards Vittoria, accompanied by the Spanish division under Colonel Longa and General Giron. The enemy advanced on the great road from Vittoria to Bilboa, resting their right on the strong heights which cover the village of Gamarra Major, and occupying the tetes de pont to the bridges over the Zadora at Gamarra and Abechucho. It now became necessary that the position of the enemy should be turned, and General Pack, with his Portuguese brigade, and Colonel Longa, with the Spanish division, were directed to turn and gain the heights, supported by Major-General Anson's brigade of light dragoons, and the 5th division of infantry, under the command of Major-General Oswald, to whom the command of all the troops was confided. In the execution of this service, which was performed with great gallantry and success, the whole of the Spanish and Portuguese force behaved most admirably. No sooner were the heights in possession of the allies, than the village of Gamarra Major was stormed and carried by the 5th brigade, under Brigadier-General Robinson; which advanced to the charge in column of battalions, under a heavy fire of artillery and musketry, without firing a shot, and after storming the place, captured three pieces of cannon. Sir Thomas Graham, supported by General Bradford's brigade of Portuguese infantry, now proceeded to attack the village of Abechucho, with the first division, by forming a strong battery against it, consisting of Dubourdieu's brigade, and Captain Romsey's troop of horse artillery, under the cover of whose fire, Colonel Walker's brigade advanced to the attack of the village, which was carried at the point of the bayonet, the light battalion having charged and taken three guns and a howitzer on the bridge. During the operations at Abechucho, the enemy made the most vigorous efforts to re-possess themselves of the village of Gamarra Major, but they were gallantly repulsed by the troops of the 5th division, under the command of General Oswald, and at length, finding all their endeavours unavailing, they desisted from the attack. The enemy had still two divisions of infantry in reserve on the heights to the left of the Zadora, and it was found impossible for the allies to cross the bridges until the troops which had moved upon his centre and left had driven this reserved corps through Vittoria. This service having been admirably performed, the enemy gave way in every direction, and the whole of the allied army was brought into communication, and co-operated in the pursuit. The movements of the troops under Sir Thomas Graham having, by the occupation of Gamarra and Abechucho, intercepted the enemy's retreat by the high road to France, the vanquished army was obliged to turn to the road towards Pampluna; but even in this direction the fugitives were unable to hold any position for a sufficient length of time to allow their baggage and artillery to be drawn off.

† Lord Wellington transmitted instructions to Sir John Murray, dated the 14th of April, directing him to embark his troops at Alicant, and to effect a landing in Catalonia, for the purpose of undertaking the siege of Tarragona, in concert with a British squadron stationed off this part of the coast of Spain, under the command of Admiral Hallowell, a most active and enterprising officer. On the 2d of June the fleet destined for this expedition anchored to the eastward of the Point of Salon; on the 3d, soon after sun-rise, the debarkation of the troops commenced; and in the course of that day the whole of the infantry, with some field pieces were landed. Tarragona was immediately reconnoitred and invested, the point of attack was decided upon, and a place fixed upon for the depot of artillery stores. Between the 4th and the 11th five batteries were constructed, and the fire was kept up with great spirit. During the latter day, Major Thackaray, the chief officer of engineers, having reported that he was now perfectly prepared to push the siege with vigour, the fire on the Fuente Reale was increased, and it was decided to storm that work during the night. The intelligence, however, which General Murray received late in the evening, of the approach of Marshal Suchet, and of the march of a French column from Barcelona, prevented him from carrying his intention into execution, and determined him to raise the siege and re-embark his troops. General Murray, in defence of his conduct for raising the siege, stated that very large French armies were advancing to the relief of the place, and that Marshal Suchet, after leaving 20,000 men to garrison the cities of Valencia and Catalonia, had still under his command a disposable force of 24,000 veteran troops. To oppose this army the British General stated that he had about 13,000 men under his immediate command, exclusive of the force under General Copons, which amounted to 8,500 men, without pay, without discipline, without a single piece of cannon, without the means of subsistence, and totally incapable of acting in the field. The allied army therefore consisted of 21,500 men, of whom 4,500 only were British and German troops, and the remainder Sicilians, Calabrese, and Spaniards, the armies of the allies being moreover greatly inferior in point of cavalry to the enemy. The embarkation of the troops, which was completed on the 17th, was made with so much precipitation, that the guns in the most advanced batteries of the allies were abandoned. However, after an ample investigation of the conduct of Sir John Murray, before a court of military inquiry, he was acquitted of all the charges brought against him, except that by which he was accused of having "unnecessarily abandoned a considerable quantity of artillery and stores, which he might have embarked in safety." This part of his conduct was, however, ascribed merely to "an error of judgment;" and nothing followed upon the decision, as the case did not appear to the Prince Regent to call for the admonition pointed out by the court.

enemy. By land, however, we were uniformly successful; and by sea, Captain (now Sir Philip Broke) nobly redeemed the naval honour of Britain. The capture of the Chesapeake by the Shannon, on the 1st of June, will long shine in our annals.

The new Parliament was opened by the Prince Regent, in person, on the 30th of November, 1812; and one of its first acts was to grant a sum not exceeding 200,000*l.* for the relief of such parts of the inhabitants of the empire of Russia as had suffered "in their persons and property, in consequence of the unprovoked and atrocious invasion of that country by the Ruler of France."

For a long period, no subject of a domestic nature had fixed upon the public mind with so much force as the discords and alienation which had for years subsisted between the Prince Regent and his illustrious consort. The cause of these dissentions it would be perhaps impossible to trace, but that they originated at a period so early as the first year of the residence of the Princess of Wales in this country, and that they were of such a nature as almost to dissolve the marriage contract, is clear from a correspondence which took place between those illustrious personages in the year 1796. The marriage of the Prince and Princess of Wales was solemnized on the 8th of April, 1795; the date of the birth of their only child was the 7th of January following; and in the month of April, in the same year, a message from the Prince was conveyed to the Princess of Wales, through the medium of Lord Cholmondeley, informing her that the intercourse between herself and the Prince was in future to be of the most restrictive nature—in fact, that a separation as to all conjugal relations was, from that time, and for ever, to take place. In this arrangement the Princess expressed her acquiescence, but she considered the subject of too important a nature to rest merely on verbal communication, and in compliance with her request, the pleasure of his Royal Highness was communicated to her in writing. In 1805, while the Prince and Princess of Wales were living in a state of separation, the Duke of Sussex informed the Prince, that Sir John Douglas had made known to him some circumstances respecting the behaviour of the Princess of Wales, which, in the opinion of the Duke, it was of the highest importance the Prince should hear, as they might, if true, not only affect the honour and peace of mind of his Royal Highness, but also the succession to the throne. Sir John and Lady Douglas, having made a formal declaration of the charges they thought proper to advance against the Princess of Wales, this declaration was submitted by the Prince to Lord Thurlow, who gave it as his opinion that his Royal Highness had no alternative but to submit the matter to the King. In consequence of this opinion, and some further examinations which took place, the declarations of William and Sarah Lambert, servants to Sir John Douglas; William Cole, Robert and Sarah Bidgood, Frances Lloyd, and Sir John and Lady Douglas, were laid before his Majesty; who thereupon issued a warrant, dated the 29th of May, 1806, directing and authorising Lord Erskine, as Lord Chancellor; Lord Grenville, as First Lord of the Treasury; Earl Spencer, as one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State; and Lord Ellenborough, as Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench; to inquire "into the truth of the said allegations, and to report to him thereon." The Commissioners so appointed first examined on oath the principal informants, Sir John Douglas, and Charlotte his wife; who both positively swore, the former, to his having observed the fact of the pregnancy of her Royal Highness; and the latter, not only that she had observed it, but that her Royal Highness had made not the least scruple of talking about it with her, and describing the stratagems she meant to resort to in order to avoid detection. It was further deposed by Lady Douglas, that in the course of the year 1802, the Princess was secretly delivered of a male child, which had been brought up in her own House, and under her own inspection! On this part of the inquiry, the commissioners, in their report to his Majesty, declared, that there is no foundation whatever for believing that the child now living with the Princess, is the child of her Royal Highness, or that she was delivered of any child in the year 1802; nor had any thing appeared to them that could warrant the belief that she was pregnant in that year, or at any other period within the compass of their inquiries. That child was, beyond all doubt, born in the Brownlow-Street Hospital, on the 11th day of July, 1802, of the body of Sophia Austin, and was first brought to the Princess's house in the month of November following. The commissioners did not feel themselves at liberty to close their report here. Besides the allegation of the pregnancy and delivery of the Princess, those declarations, on the whole of which his Majesty had been pleased to command them to inquire and report, contained other particulars respecting the conduct of her Royal Highness, such as must necessarily give occasion to very unfavourable impressions.

From the various depositions and proofs annexed to this report, particularly from the examination of Robert Bidgood, William Cole, Frances Lloyd, and Mrs. Lisle,* it would, the commissioners said, "be perceived, that several strong circumstances of this description, had been positively sworn to by witnesses, who could not, in their judgment, be suspected of any unfavourable bias, and whose veracity, in this respect, they had no ground to question; "it appears therefore," continued the commissioners, "that as on the one hand, the fact of pregnancy and delivery are, to our minds, satisfactorily disproved; so on the other we think, that the circumstances to which we now refer, particularly those stated to have passed between her Royal Highness and Captain Manby, must be credited, until they shall receive some decisive contradiction; and if true, are justly entitled to the most serious consideration." Immediately on the receipt of a copy of this report, the Princess of Wales addressed a letter to his Majesty on the subject; in which, in the face of the Almighty, she assured his Majesty, not only of her innocence as to the weightier parts of the charge preferred against her by her enemies, but of her freedom from all the indecorums and improprieties which had been imputed to her by the Lords Commissioners, upon the evidence of persons who spoke as falsely as Sir John and Lady Douglas themselves. On the 17th of August she again wrote to the King, requesting that she might have authenticated copies of the report, and of the declarations and depositions on which it proceeded. Having received these papers, the Princess submitted them to her legal advisers, Lord Eldon, Mr. Perceval, and Sir Thomas Plomer, and on the 2d of October she transmitted to his Majesty an elaborate letter, containing her observations on the charges against her, and the evidence on which they rested.† Nine weeks having elapsed after this letter was sent to his Majesty without any

* Bidgood and Cole, it was said stated, that certain levities of a nature unbecoming her rank and station, and incompatible with the character of a virtuous woman, had been practised by the Princess of Wales, in the years 1802-3; and that Sir Sidney Smith, Mr. Lawrence, the artist, and Captain Manby, of the ship Africaine, had been admitted to her house on a footing that warranted suspicion of criminal intercourse. Frances Lloyd spoke less distinctly to the same fact; and Mrs. Lisle, a lady of the Princess's household, whose evidence was principally relied upon, deposed, that the behaviour of the Princess towards Captain Manby, who often visited at Montague-House, was a flirting conduct, and such as, in the witness's opinion, did not become a married woman.

† After stating that the extravagance of the malice of Sir John and Lady Douglas had defeated itself, she states that there still remained imputations "strongly sanctioned and countenanced by the report," respecting which she could not remain silent without incurring the most fatal consequences to her honour and character. Against the substance of the proceeding itself, and the manner in which it was conducted, she considered herself bound to protest. The report proceeded upon ex parte examination, without affording her an opportunity of explaining or defending her conduct, or without the Lords Commissioners even hearing one word which she could urge in her own defence. For more than two years, she had been informed, her conduct had been made the subject of investigation; but the cause of this she did not learn till the investigation had actually taken place, and then she found that the charge against her was high treason, committed any reply, the Princess again wrote, expressing her anxiety, and her wish to learn whether she might be admitted to the royal presence. In reply to which her Royal Highness was informed, that her vindication had been referred to his Majesty's confidential servants, who had given it as their opinion, "that it was no longer necessary for his Majesty to decline receiving the Princess into his royal presence;" but at the same time, "his Majesty could not forbear to express in the conclusion of the business, his desire and expectation, that such a conduct might be in future observed by the Princess, as may fully justify those marks of paternal regard and affection, which the King always wishes to shew to every part of his royal family." The Princess no sooner received this communication, than she named a day, on which, if agreeable to his Majesty, she would have the happiness to throw herself in filial duty and affection at his Majesty's feet. The day, however, was at first postponed by his Majesty, who afterwards informed the Princess, that at the request of the Prince of Wales, he declined to see her until her vindication had been examined by the lawyers of the Prince, and until the Prince had been enabled to submit the statement which he proposed to make thereon. The Princess remonstrated in strong terms against the unparalleled injustice and cruelty of this interposition of the Prince of Wales, at such a time, and under such circumstances; and trusted that his Majesty would recall his determination not to see her till the Prince's answer respecting her vindication was received.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE REGENT, DELIVERING A SPEECH IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

After a lapse of three weeks, during which time it does not appear that any reply was made to the letter of the Princess, her Royal Highness informed his Majesty that having received no command to wait upon his Majesty, and no intimation of his pleasure, she was reduced to the necessity, in vindication of her character, to resort to the publication of the proceedings upon the inquiry into her conduct, and that the publication alluded to would not be withheld beyond the following Monday.* To avoid coming to this painful extremity, she had taken every step in her power, except that which would be abandoning her character to utter infamy, and her station in life to no uncertain danger, and possibly to no very distant destruction. This letter was dated the 5th of March, within two days of which time a resolution was taken to call Mr. Perceval and his friends to his Majesty's councils. As soon as the ministerial arrangements could be completed, a minute of council was made, dated April 22, 1807, wherein it was humbly submitted to his Majesty, "that it was essentially necessary, in justice to her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, and for the honour and interest of his Majesty's illustrious family, that her Royal Highness should be admitted, with as little delay as possible, into his Majesty's presence; and that she should be received in a manner due to her rank and station, in his Majesty's court and family." Notwithstanding this advice, it does not appear that the Princess of Wales was ever restored to complete favour either at court or in the royal family. Her intercourse with her daughter also became subject to great restraint.

Nothing, however, occurred, that is publicly or officially known, till the month of January, 1813. At this time the Princess was so much debarred from the society of her daughter, that she determined to write to the Prince Regent on the subject; but, though her letter was transmitted to ministers on the 14th, it was not till the 23d that it was read to his Royal Highness. In this letter she dwelt with great force upon the injustice of widening the separation between mother and daughter, which she considered as not only cutting her off from one of the few domestic enjoyments which she still retained, but as giving countenance to those calumnious reports which had been proved to be totally unfounded. In consequence of this letter, which, soon after it was sent, appeared in one of the daily journals, the Prince Regent thought proper to direct, that the letter of the Princess of Wales, and the whole of the documents relating to the investigation of 1806, (inappropriately called the 'delicate investigation') should be referred to the members of his Majesty's Privy Council, for their consideration, and that they should report to his Royal Highness their "opinion, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, it was fit and proper that the intercourse between the Princess of Wales and her daughter, the Princess Charlotte, should continue to be subject to regulations and restrictions."

In virtue of this appointment, the members of the Privy Council assembled on the 23d of February, when they reported to the Prince Regent, that, in their opinion, "it was highly fit and proper, that the intercourse between her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, and her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte, should continue to be subject to regulation and restraint."

On the 1st of March, the Princess of Wales addressed a letter to the speaker of the House of Commons, in which she complains that the tendency of this report, a copy of which had been transmitted to her by Lord Sidmouth, was to cast aspersions upon her honour and character. Thus assailed by a secret tribunal, before which she could not be heard in her own defence, she was compelled to throw herself upon the House, and upon the justice of Parliament, and to require that the fullest investigation might be instituted into the whole of her conduct during her residence in this country. "The Princess of Wales," adds the letter to the Speaker, "fears no scrutiny, "however strict, provided she is tried by impartial judges, known to the constitution, and in the fair and open manner the law of the land requires. Her only desire is, that she may be either declared to be innocent, or proved to be guilty." On the 5th of March, Mr. C. Johnstone, after avowing that he had no concert with, or authority from the Princess of Wales, submitted to the House of Commons a motion for an address to the Prince Regent, requesting him to order that a copy of a report made to his Majesty on the 14th of July, 1806, by the Lord Chancellor Erskine, Lord Grenville, and Lord Ellenborough, touching the committed in the infamous crime of adultery. Her Royal Highness dwells with great force of argument on the extreme improbability of Lady Douglas's accusation respecting her pregnancy. But as the commissioners most unequivocally and decidedly acquit her of that charge, she proceeds to examine the evidence of those witnesses, who, in the opinion of the commissioners, were particularly deserving of credit, namely, W. Cole, R. Bidgood, F. Lloyd, and Mrs. Lisle. Having replied to the evidence of Cole, Bidgood, and Lloyd, she proceeds to observe upon the evidence of Mrs. Lisle. What is exactly meant by flirting conduct, "it is difficult," says the Princess, "with any precision to ascertain. How many women are there, most virtuous, most truly modest, incapable of any thing impure, vicious, or immoral, in deed or thought, who, from greater vivacity of spirits, from less natural reserve, from the want of caution, which the very consciousness of innocence betrays into, conduct themselves in a manner which a woman of a graver character, of a more reserved disposition, but not with one particular or superior virtue, thinks too incautious, too unreserved, too familiar; and which, if forced upon her oath to give her opinion upon it, she might feel herself, as an honest woman, bound to say, in that opinion was flirting." The other allegations of the different witnesses, are all then examined in their order, and the Princess, in concluding her letter to the King, thus expresses herself: "Oh, sire, to be unfortunate, and scarcely to feel at liberty to lament; to be cruelly used, and to feel it almost an offence and a duty to be silent—is a hard lot; but use has in some degree inured me to it. Before my spirits had been yet all lowered by my misfortunes, I should have been disposed to have met such a charge with the contempt, which, I trust, by this time, your Majesty thinks due to it; I should have been disposed to defy my enemies to the utmost; and to have scorned to answer any thing but a legal charge, before a competent tribunal; but in my present misfortunes such force of mind is gone. I ought, perhaps, so far to be thankful to them for their wholesome lessons of humility. I have, therefore, entered into this long detail, to endeavour to remove, at the first possible opportunity, any unfavourable impressions; to rescue myself from the dangers which the continuance of these suspicions might occasion, and to preserve to me your Majesty's good opinion, in whose kindness, hitherto, I have found infinite consolation, and to whose justice, under all circumstances, I can confidently appeal. . . . . At all events, I trust your Majesty will restore me to the blessing of your gracious presence, and confirm to me, by your own gracious words, your satisfactory conviction of my innocence."

* All the principal documents connected with this subject, comprehending the report of the Lords Commissioners, the letters of the Princess of Wales to his Majesty, and the depositions both criminatory and exculpatory, had already been printed under the superintendance of Mr. Perceval, in a volume quaintly styled "The Book."

conduct of her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, be laid before the House, with a view to an inquiry, now, while the witnesses on both sides were still living, into all the allegations, facts, and circumstances, appertaining to that investigation; a proceeding, which, in his opinion, was due to the honour of her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, the safety of the throne, and the tranquillity of the country.

Lord Castlereagh, in opposing the motion, said, the House could not suppose, that the papers called for by the honourable mover, were at all necessary to remove any apprehension as to the successor to the throne of these kingdoms. The innocence of the Princess of Wales of the charge brought against her by Lady Douglas, had been established on the report of the members of two successive administrations; and if a prosecution had not been instituted against her accusers, it did not arise from any doubt in the minds of the law officers, as to the punishment that would be brought down upon the degraded and guilty heads of Sir John and Lady Douglas, but from a wish to avoid bringing such subjects before the public. It may suffice to add, that the document called for, was not produced; the Princess was declared free from imputation; and addresses of congratulation poured in upon her from all quarters of the kingdom.

Mr. Grattan, on the 30th of April, presented to the House, his bill "to provide for the removal of the civil and military disqualifications under which his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects now labour." On the 18th of May, the bill was read a second time, and committed for the following day; but it was lost in a subsequent stage:*

In submitting his new plan of finance to the consideration of the House of Commons, Mr. Vansittart said, that further measures might be taken for promoting and facilitating the redemption of the land-tax. For the completion of this part of his plans, he chiefly relied upon the simplification of the mode of the redemption of the land-tax, and on creating facilities for its purchase, by freeing it from troublesome formalities. He should propose, that upon a simple notice given to the collector, by any person desirous of redeeming his land-tax, the collector might be allowed to charge his tax double or treble, as might be agreed upon, for a certain number of years respectively, at the close of which the process of redemption should terminate; and that the produce of such tax should be annually applied to the redemption of the national debt. In the second place, he should propose, that on all loans hereafter to be contracted, there should be a provision made for discharging the debt. There was a third proposition to which he wished to call the attention of the House: it was his intention to submit a measure for the repeal of part of the act of 1802, regarding the sinking fund. The sinking fund should be sacredly supported to a certain amount; but he believed it might be shewn that its enormous increase, by throwing into the market immense sums of money at one time, would produce effects similar to those of a national bankruptcy. When the establishment of a sinking fund was proposed by Mr. Pitt, in 1786, the national debt amounted to nearly 240,000,000*l.*—a sum of which few then living ever hoped to see the redemption, but which, by the steady perseverance of Parliament, in this important measure, had already been redeemed; while within the same period, 200,000,000*l.* of war taxes had been paid by the unexampled exertions of the country. Having entered into various other statements, he said, by the plan now proposed, a gradual and equitable reduction of the debt might be provided for with great and immediate advantage to the public; it would only be necessary to enact, that the debt first contracted, should be deemed first to be paid off, whether purchased by the sinking fund, originally provided for its redemption or not. In order, however, effectually to secure the means of redeeming all future loans within 45 years, and to preserve a proper proportion between the sinking fund and the unredeemed debt, it would be expedient to enact, that whenever the sum borrowed in any year should exceed the sum to be paid off, a sinking fund should be provided for the excess of the loan, equal to one-half of its interest; and for the remainder of the loan, or for the whole, if not exceeding the amount to be redeemed within the year, a sinking fund of one per cent. conformable to the act of 1792. This arrangement involved the repeal of those provisions of the act of 1802, under which the whole sinking fund then existing was directed to accumulate, at compound interest. Till the complete redemption of the debt, which then remained unredeemed, it would be proper to make good to the sinking fund, the annual sum of 870,000*l.* which would have been appropriated to the different sums provided for in 1802, if that consolidation had not taken place, and if those sums had been accompanied by the usual redeeming fund of one per cent. If this plan were adopted, no fresh taxes would be required for four years, except about 1,000,000*l.* for the year 1813.—After this developement of the new plan of finance, the Chancellor of the Exchequer read the resolutions grounded upon it, which he proposed to submit to the committee, and which were ultimately passed without any essential alterations. In submitting to the House the proposed ways and means for the year, in case his plan with respect to the sinking fund should not be adopted, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, that the sum to be raised was 1,136,000*l.* for which he meant to provide by an additional duty on tobacco, in lieu of the proposed auction duty of last year; additional duties on the consolidated customs, with some exceptions; an additional duty of thirteen-pence per bottle, on French wines; an increased duty of two-thirds on goods imported from France, and her dependencies; an increase generally of one-half the present amount of the war duties on exports; and an additional duty of one penny per pound on the export of foreign hides. These resolutions, which proposed taxes as little burthensome as possible, were agreed to, with expressions of satisfaction.

One of the most momentous and permanently interesting questions which came before Parliament, during the session of 1812, was that which related to the renewal of the charter of the East India Company. On the 22d of March, Lord Castlereagh observed, that the term of the existing charter of the East India Company, would expire in May, 1814, and in renewing the charter, his Majesty's ministers had to consider three propositions—Whether the existing government in India should be allowed to continue in its present state—whether an entire change should take place in the system—or whether a middle course should be adopted. On a question of so much importance, it was deemed necessary to hear evidence at the bar; and, on the 30th of March, the examination of witnesses commenced at the bar of the House of Commons, before a committee of the whole House. The individuals examined, were principally those who had occupied high stations in India; and the general tendency of their evidence was against opening the trade, and decidedly against allowing missionaries to repair to the east for the purpose of proselyting the natives to the Christian faith. The subject continued before the two Houses of Parliament, till the 22d of June. An ardent zeal for religion had displayed itself in a great number of petitions to parliament, praying, that in the new ar-

* In the discussion on the Catholic emancipation bill, the most extensive and liberal principles of religious toleration were generally professed. Hence, probably, the time was chosen for an attempt to relieve from the pains and penalties still legally impending over them, those Christians who impugn the doctrine of the trinity, and to extend to them the benefits of the toleration act. Mr. William Smith moved for leave to bring in a bill for this purpose. As the law stood, he said, persons who in conversation, or writing, denied the existence of any of the persons of the trinity, were disabled, on conviction, from holding any office, civil, ecclesiastical, or military; and if a second time convicted, they were disabled to sue or prosecute, in any action or information, or to be the guardian of any child, and were liable to imprisonment for three years. The object of the honourable gentleman was to bring in a bill for the repeal of these laws; and a bill was accordingly introduced, and carried successfully through all its stages.

rangements for the government of India, provision should be made for the instruction of the natives in the principles of the Christian faith: and so much attention had been paid to these applications, that an addition was made to the 13th resolution, to the effect, "that such measures ought to be adopted as might tend to the introduction of useful knowledge, and of religious and moral improvement, among the natives of the British dominions in India; and that, in furtherance of the above objects, sufficient facilities should be afforded by law, to persons desirous of going to, and remaining in India, for the purpose of accomplishing these benevolent designs. A long debate ensued, which terminated in a division of the House, when there appeared for the resolution, 89, and against it 36 voices. All the resolutions, with certain alterations, were ultimately passed,* and a bill grounded upon them came to its third reading in the House of Commons, on the 13th of July. At the close of the session, this highly important measure passed into a law, and the path taken by government, in forming the resolutions on which the bill was grounded, although, perhaps, not perfectly satisfactory to any party, was, on the whole, the course dictated by wisdom and enlightened policy. Parliament was prorogued on the 22d of July.

A. D. 1814.] By the middle of January, 1814, the allied sovereigns, with their respective armies, had crossed the Rhine, and were in full march towards the capital of France.† On the 25th of the same month, Buonaparte, confiding the regency of the empire to his wife, left Paris to place himself at the head of the army. But the protecting power of his presence had been dissolved; the appalling force of his arm had fled; and the great, the sacred, the invincible nation, bled beneath a succession of defeats. In the interim, plenipotentiaries from France, and from the other belligerent powers, assembled at Chatillon.‡ Terms, the most magnanimous in their nature, were submitted to Buonaparte; terms, by which he might have retained his throne, and have preserved France in a state superior

* The original resolutions opened with a declaration, that it is expedient, that all the privileges, authorities, and immunities, granted to the East India Company, shall continue and be in force for the further term of 20 years, except as far as the same may hereinafter be modified and repealed. The second resolution provides, that the present restraints on the commercial intercourse with China, and the company's exclusive trade in tea, shall be continued. The third and fourth contain a permission to any of his Majesty's subjects to export to, and import from, all ports within the limits of the Company's charter, China excepted, such goods, wares, &c. as are allowed by law. The fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth, provide, that warehouses at the said ports, be deemed safe for the purposes of the revenue; that the vessels, in which goods are imported and exported, be of the burthen of at least 350 tons; and that on approaching port, they notify their arrival by a manifesto. The ninth contains regulations as to the importation and sale of silk and hair goods. The tenth regulates the application of the Company's revenues: 1. To the payment of the troops, and support of the forts. 2. To liquidate the debts on bills of exchange. 3. Other debts, except bond debts. 4. To pay a debt of ten per cent. and a contingent half per cent. 5. To liquidate the bond debts until they amount to ten millions in India, and three millions in England. 6. The surplus profits to be divided in the ratio of five-sixths to government, and one-sixth to the Company, and a provision for paying the capital stock. The eleventh resolution regards the employment of India shipping; the twelfth makes provision for the support and return of Lascars brought to England, in private vessels; the thirteenth grants pensions and gratuities by the Company; the fourteenth regards the appointments to the different presidencies; and the fifteenth places the church establishment, in the British territories in India, under the superintendance of a bishop and three archdeacons.

† At the opening of the campaign, the forces of the allies were divided into seven armies, of which four acted immediately against France, one in Holland, and two in Italy. They were thus divided: First, the grand Austro-Russian army, commanded by Prince Schwartzenberg, was composed of the Austrian division of Colloredo, Wimpfen, Giulay, Bianchi, Bubna, Maurice, and Louis of Lichtenstein; the Russian division of Barclay de Tolly and Wittgenstein; the Bavarians, in three divisions, commanded by Count Wrede; and the Wirtembergers, under the Prince Royal of Wirtemberg. Second, The grand army of Prussia, or Silesia, commanded by Marshal Blucher, was formed of the corps of D'Yorck, Kleist, Bulow; the four Russian corps of Tscherbatoff, Langeron, Sacken, and Winzingerode, and the Saxons, under the Prince of Saxe Weimar, and Baron de Thielman. Third, the grand Swedish army, commanded by Marshal Bernadotte, the Prince Royal of Sweden, consisting of the Swedish corps, the five Russian corps of Benningsen, Tettenborn, Doernberg, Benkendorf, and Czernicheff—the first of which remained before Hamburgh, a corps of Hanoverians, the Hanseatic troops, and the contingents of the smaller states of the confederation. Fourth, the Anglo-Spanish and Portuguese army of the Pyrennees, under the command of Lord Wellington, in the south of France. Fifth, the Anglo-Batavian army, commanded by Sir Thomas Graham, in Holland. Sixth, the Austrian army in Italy, commanded by Count Bellegarde. Seventh, the army of Naples, under the orders of Murat, who joined the confederation, by a treaty dated January 11, 1814.—The armies operating upon the Rhine probably exceeded half a million of men. Prussia and Austria had between them an effective force of 250,000 men; Russia alone had nearly 200,000; and to these may be added, 30,000 Swedes, 10,000 Danes, and a large number of troops contributed by the Princes of the confederation of the Rhine. This immense body did not, however, take the field at the same moment. The first armies, which passed the Rhine, at the end of December, consisted of about 350,000 men, to which an augmentation of about one-third was made by reinforcements, which arrived about the middle of February.

‡ No endeavours were spared to raise the male population of France, en masse; commissioners were dispatched to all the military divisions of the empire to facilitate the organization of the levies; and the Duke of Vicenza, minister of the interior relations of France, was sent to the head-quarters of the allied sovereigns at Basle, to propose that a congress for the negociation of a general peace should assemble at Chatillon-sur-Seine. These overtures were accepted by the allies, without hesitation: and plenipotentiaries were appointed to the congress, which assembled at the place proposed, between the 15th and the 20th of January; but the allies, secure in their own resources, peremptorily refused either to suspend or to interrupt the military movements of their armies during the progress of the negociations. The invading force, bearing down all opposition, still continued to advance; and, at length, an army was assembled before Chalons, between the Marne and the Seine, and Buonaparte prepared to quit his capital, to place himself at the head of his troops. On the 24th of January, the allies commenced their operations in the interior, by the battle of Bar, between Chaumont and Joinville.—Mortier defended this position, but he was eventually obliged to abandon the town, and to retire upon Troyes. Blucher, proceeding on his march to form the meditated junction with Prince Schwartzenberg, possessed himself, on the 23d and 24th, of Ligny and St. Dizier, and from thence pushed forward a corps towards Brienne, to establish a communication with the Austrian division at Bar. Buonaparte, sensible of the importance of this movement, and determined to defeat its object, made immediate preparations to attack the Prussian rear-guard, while it awaited the arrival of D'Yorck's division from St. Dizier. This attack, in which the French were successful, took place on the 27th, and the allies were forced from their position.—On the 29th, at mid-day, the French army appeared; the battle which ensued was most sanguinary; and the French army was left in possession of the field. This success enabled the French columns, under Marshal Victor, and General Grouchy, to take up fine positions at the villages of La Rothiere and Dienville, on the 30th. The hostile armies passed two days in sight of each other. General D'Yorck recaptured the town of St. Dizier; while Count Wittgenstein, supported by Count Wrede, repulsed the corps of Marshal Marmont, near Vassy. The grand allied army, under Prince Schwartzenberg, approached towards the Aube, and the general commandant, Count Barclay de Tolly, united the Russian and Prussian guards, to form a reserve on the heights, and in the defiles of Trannes, from which he could support any point that was menaced. At half-past twelve o'clock, on the 1st of February, the cavalry of the two armies were put in motion. About three o'clock, all the allied troops deployed in the plains of La Rothiere and Brienne, and at that hour, the battle became general. The ardour of the troops was excited to enthusiasm by the presence of the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia. The efforts of the Russians, in front of the line, were directed by Marshal Blucher in person. At length, the whole village of La Rothiere was ceded to the obstinate valour of the Russians; and General Sacken, who had three times been on the point of becoming a prisoner, made a bold charge on the right of the village, seized 20 pieces of cannon, and took from 5 to 600 prisoners of the French guards. At midnight, Buonaparte made his last attack on La Rothiere, which the Russians repulsed, and thus decided the victory in favour of the allies. Under favour of the night, the French army concealed from the allies the disorder into which it had been thrown at the close of the action, and effected its retreat on Troyes and Arcis. The allied sovereigns now decided that their armies should march to the capital in two grand corps; the one following the course of the Seine, by the road of Troyes and Sens; and the other advancing on the banks of the Marne, by Chalons, Chateau Thierry, and Meaux. This plan of dividing the allied forces, though liable to serious objections, afforded the double advantage of securing subsistence in a country which they conceived to be drained of provisions, and of placing the enemy between two hostile armies, one of which might hold him in check, while the other, by its sudden appearance at the gates of the metropolis, would cause every idea of defence to be abandoned, and prevent the destruction of the city.—The first effect of this arrangement was to separate the army of Silesia from the grand army; and while Marshal Blucher took the direction of Ferre Champenoise towards the Marne, the Prince of Schwartzenberg marched on Troyes. Resolved to expel the enemy from that town, the allies pushed forward strong corps on the roads to Arcis, Bar-sur-Aube, and Sens, to intercept the communication of the French army with Paris. The alarm in the capital now became extreme. Works were begun for the purpose of guarding the approaches; the barriers were palisadoed to guard against a coup de main; and Passy, Montmartre, and the adjoining heights, were fixed upon to serve as the defensive positions. Towers were, at the same time, made to St. Denis and Abervilliers, and an immense fabrication of pikes was announced for the purpose of arming the peasantry.—

perior to that in which she stood at the revolution; but, impelled by that insanity, which seemed to have actuated all his recent actions, he rejected the projet of the allies, and rushed upon his fate. Nor did that fate remain long in suspense. The projet had been rejected on the 12th of March; on the 18th, a final rupture

Such was the situation of the metropolis, when Buonaparte, on the 6th of February, abandoned Troyes, and retreated to Nogent, for the purpose of arresting the progress of the Silesian army. After the capture of Troyes, a momentary indecision seemed to pervade the councils of the allied sovereigns. The Austrian monarch wished for peace, but his views did not extend to the overthrow of the reigning dynasty. In this policy, Russia and Britain seem to have acquiesced. The conferences at Chatillon had opened on the 4th of February, and Lord Castlereagh had arrived at that place to take part in the deliberations. The pacific disposition of Austria did not escape the observation of Buonaparte; and, relying on this disposition, he sent instructions to his plenipotentiary at Chatillon, the object of which was to propose an armistice, founded upon the basis laid down by the allies, and offering, at the same time, to surrender all the fortified places in the countries proposed to be ceded by France, on condition that military operations should be entirely suspended. To this the allies replied, that instead of an armistice, it was their wish that the preliminaries of peace should be signed without delay, with a condition that the principal places now invested by their armies, comprehending Antwerp, Wesel, Mentz, Strasburg, and Besancon, should be resigned by Buonaparte, as pledges for the sincerity of his intentions. On the 9th of February, several Prussian battalions entered Chateau Thierry, and were soon succeeded by a number of Russian brigades, supported by cavalry and artillery. These troops, which formed the advanced guard of Marshal Blucher's army, soon extended themselves to Meaux, announcing that they were on their march to Paris, which it was their intention to enter on the succeeding Sunday. On the Seine, detachments from Prince Schwartzenberg's army touched upon the gates of Sens, while his light troops pushed forwards to Melun, distant only ten leagues from Paris. Buonaparte found himself thus doubly outflanked; but he resolved to fall, by a bold and rapid march, on the flank and rear of Marshal Blucher's army, and not merely to repulse, but to annihilate, these divisions of the invaders. On the 9th, orders were dispatched to Marshals Marmont and Ney, to prepare to attack the enemy. On the 10th, at daybreak, Buonaparte conducted his troops to the heights of St. Prix, while Marmont was ordered to pass the swampy defile of St. Gond, and to attack the village of Baye. At this point, the advanced-guard of the Russian General, Alsufieff, was stationed, but being unprovided with cavalry, and seeing himself attacked by 5 or 6000 dragoons, and a superior body of infantry, he concentrated all his force, amounting to 4 or 5000 men, at Champeaubert, intending to fight as he retreated. The cavalry of the Imperial Guard now deployed upon the plain, attacking and turning the Russians, in order to intercept their march on the Chalons road. In vain did General Alsufieff form his infantry in squares; in vain did he attempt to resist the shock of the French cavalry, and the fire of their numerous batteries; his ranks gave way in all directions; and artillery, infantry, and cavalry, fled into the woods and marshes. The General, several superior officers, and more than 2000 men, were made prisoners; and of 24 pieces of cannon, nine remained in the hands of the victors. General Sacken, having learned the disaster of his advanced guard, quitted Ferte-Sous-Jouarre, and marched all night on the 10th towards Montmirail, after having dispatched several messengers to General D'Yorck, who, by his advice, marched from the environs of Meaux, in the same direction. In the forenoon of the 11th, General Sacken's corps, reinforced by three brigades from General D'Yorck's division, appeared before Montmirail, where Buonaparte had already arrived, with the division of Ricard, and the Imperial Guard. The Russian army consisted of only 18 or 20,000 men, but being no longer able to avoid a battle, they attacked the village of Marchais, where the division of Ricard was posted, under the immediate command of Marshal Ney. This village was twice taken and re-taken; and the Russians exhibited, in the assault, as much impetuosity as the French displayed determination and bravery in its defence. At length, the Russians, thrown into extreme disorder, at all points, retired by the road of Chateau Thierry, having sustained a loss of 5 or 6000 men. The French army now supported their privations and fatigues without a murmur, and testified the happiest disposition. Marshal Blucher having heard of the disasters of Generals Sacken and D'Yorck, collected the Prussian corps of General Kleist, and the Russian division of General Langeron, forming in all, about 18,000 men, and on the 13th, marched against Marshal Marmont's position at Etoges, on the road from Chalons to Montmirail. This movement re-called Buonaparte from the pursuit of General Sacken, and on the 14th, he quitted Chateau Thierry, and made a forced march to join Marmont. At eight o'clock, the cavalry of his advanced guard appeared upon the heights of Vauchamp, where they seized six pieces of cannon. The Prussians formed themselves in squares, and for some time firmly maintained their ground; but, being overpowered by numbers, two of the Prussian battalions were taken, and three others either sabred or driven into the woods. At sun-set, the Prussian commander perceived the main body of the French cavalry had turned his flank, and thrown themselves on the line of his retreat. Only one way of escape remained, and that, with the usual decision and promptitude of the veteran General, was instantly adopted—he ordered his troops to continue their march, and to cut their way through every obstacle. This heroic expedient succeeded; but, the loss sustained by the Prussians on this day, amounted to at least 4000 men, with nine pieces of cannon. Buonaparte now left Marshal Blucher, to accomplish his admirable retreat upon Chalons, and to rally and re-unite the scattered corps of his army. Schwartzenberg, desirous of effecting a diversion in favour of Marshal Blucher, developed an immense force upon the banks of the Seine, near Nogent, while Count Wrede, and General Witgenstein, marched upon Melun, pushing forward the Cossack force, under Platoff, to Fontainbleau, which city he entered on the 17th. On the same day, Buonaparte arrived by forced marches at Nangis, in the vicinity of Melun, and about four leagues to the east of that place. Here three divisions of Count Wittgenstein's corps were posted. The General of Division, Gerard, opened an attack on the village of Mormant, while the cavalry of Generals Milhaud and Kellerman, assailed the Russians on the left, and several batteries advanced to bombard the village. The squares, into which the Russians had formed themselves, gave way before the artillery, and fled in the direction of Montereau, leaving 14 pieces of cannon, and 4000 prisoners. In the afternoon of the 18th, Buonaparte arrived with his staff from Nangis, in front of Montereau, and gave orders for a vigorous attack upon the plain. The French army, amounting to 28,000 men, and 60 pieces of cannon, now moved from all parts of the line, while, at the same time, General Pajol made a charge of cavalry, and turned the flanks of the Prince Royal of Wirtemberg. The onset was irresistible; and the allies fled precipitately into Montereau. Their loss amounted to about 1800 men; besides a considerable quantity of arms, and several pieces of cannon. The Emperor of Russia, and the King of Prussia, on hearing of the discomfiture of their troops at Montereau, hastily quitted Bray, where their head-quarters had been established; and Buonaparte is said to have exultingly exclaimed, "My heart is relieved; I have saved the capital of my empire!" The allies had now nearly lost all the ground which they had gained by the battle of Rothiere, and they, in their turn, relied upon pacific negociations. The Austrian General, Count de Paar, accordingly presented himself at the advanced posts of the French, and demanded a suspension of arms. M. de Rumigny, secretary to the cabinet, also arrived at the head-quarters of the French army, from the congress at Chatillon, with a draft of the conditions of the preliminary treaty. The proposition comprehended all the bases deemed necessary for the re-establishment of a political equilibrium. The treaty, which proceeded upon the ground of placing France in the same territorial situation as she stood under her kings, with some addition to her ancient limits, contained a proposition, that the capital of France should be occupied by the armies of the allied sovereigns till a definitive treaty of peace should be arranged and executed. Buonaparte, elevated by his late successes, seized, with fury, the paper which contained the proposition of peace, exclaiming, while he tore it, "Occupy the French capital! I am at this moment nearer to Vienna than they are to Paris!" The advantages, however, of the allies, were immense; every fortress which fell on either side of the Rhine, augmented their means of invasion; the Oder, the Elbe, and the Rhine, had become a triple line of reserves, from which they continually drew reinforements, and by a judicious union of caution, skill, and energy, they hoped ultimately to surmount all the obstacles that had hitherto retarded their progress. On the 20th, the French army quitted Montereau, and on the 21st passed through Nogent. At Mery, on the Seine, a small town, six leagues to the north-west of Troyes, an attempt was made by the allies to check the progress of the enemy, but after an obstinate engagement, in which the bridge was broken down, and the town itself nearly destroyed by fire, Marshal Blucher was obliged to retreat, and on the 24th, Buonaparte entered Troyes at the head of his victorious army. The grand Austro-Russian army evacuated the whole country between the Seine and the Yonne, and fell back upon Vancœuvres and Chaumont. Blucher, however, commenced the execution of a plan, by which offensive warfare was about to be renewed on the part of the allies, with renovated vigour. From the 24th to the 27th of February, Buonaparte remained stationary at Troyes; and Blucher, availing himself of this period of inaction, marched in the direction of Ferre Champenoise, towards the Marne, with the intention to form a junction with the corps of Generals Winzingerode and Bulow, who, having forced the northern frontier, and released Belgium from the dominion of France, had advanced into the vicinity of Rheims and Soissons. On the advance of the Russians, the small corps of French troops, under General Maison, had evacuated Brussels, and on the 2d of February, the Cossacks entered the city. In almost all the towns of Brabant, the Russians were received with demonstrations of joy; a deputation from Ghent presented the keys of that place to General Bulow, and the allies soon extended their legions over every part of Belgium. In French Flanders, intestine commotions prevailed at the same time, to a most alarming extent; the country was overrun by refractory conscripts, and the communication between Dunkirk and the capital, became subject to daily interruption. Vitry, Chalons, Epernay, and Chateau Thierry, again fell into the possession of the Silesian army, which now occupied 40 leagues of the Marne, stretching from the source of that river to Meaux, in the vicinity of Paris. Alarmed by the dangers of the capital, Buonaparte quitted Troyes, on the 27th, for the purpose of repeating, if possible, the manœuvres of Champeaubert, and Montmirail. The result, however, was widely different; and, in its consequences, accelerated the fate of the French empire. On the 6th of March, Buonaparte had moved on Corbenie, and at a short distance, he found the Russian infantry posted in front of Craone. Marshal Blucher now conceived one of those bold plans for which the tactics of that General have been so much distinguished. Having formed his army in echelon, from the plain of Craone to the approaches of Laon, he formed a detachment of 10,000 horse, consisting nearly of the whole of the cavalry; the command of this force he conferred upon General Winzingerode, ordering him to march during the night, by the roads of Chevrigny and Presle, and after throwing himself upon the French line of communication, to turn Napoleon's position at Craone. The position taken up, by the allies, on the evening of the 6th, was unusually rupture of the negociations at Chatillon, took place;* on the 31st, the Emperor of Russia, and the King of Prussia entered Paris; on the 20th of April, Buonaparte, after casting many a long, lingering look behind, left Fontainbleau; and, on the 3d of May, "the first of heroes and of men," who had found Europe too small for his grasp, took possession of his new and extensive Empire—the Isle of Elba.†

unusually strong; the right and left, as well as the front, were protected by ravines, to which there was no approach, except by a narrow defile. On the 7th, at day-break, Buonaparte caused this position to be reconnoitred, and at eleven o'clock in the forenoon he commenced the attack with his whole force, estimated at 50,000 men. After much severe fighting, the allies finding themselves turned, and pressed on all sides, determined upon a retreat in the direction of Laon; but their movements were conducted with such admirable coolness and regularity, that they lost neither cannon nor prisoners, and all the efforts of the French to break their ranks by a general charge of cavalry, failed in their object. Buonaparte next determined to carry the position of Laon, and on the 9th, he marched with the main body of his army to that place. Early in the day, he advanced to the attack, and, under cover of a dense fog, seized the villages of Semilly and Ardon, situated under the town itself, and forming part of its suburbs. Towards eleven o'olock, the fog began to disperse, and Blucher, perceiving from the heights that the French were in force behind the villages of Ardon, Semilly, and Levilly, immediately ordered the combined cavalry of the rear-guard to advance, and turn the left flank of the French army. At the same time, Woronzow marched with his infantry from the left wing, and pushed forward two battalions of chasseurs, who drove the French advanced posts out of Semilly, and held their left in check till the allied cavalry arrived. The centre and left of the French army were now seen in full retreat, but this was merely a feint, for the purpose of drawing the allies into the plain, while a more serious and general attack was made upon their position. Marmont, with an advanced guard of 16 battalions of infantry, supported by cavalry and flying artillery, attacked and carried the village of Athies; but scarcely had he established himself in his new position, when night began to close in upon the combatants, and when a mass of the Russian cavalry put in practice against his troops the manœuvre which had failed at Craone. About seven in the evening, the Cossacks, with a general hourra, surprised his park of artillery, and succeeded in carrying off 30 pieces of cannon. Prince William of Prussia, in concert with Generals Horn and Ziethen, and supported by the corps of Generals D'Yorck and Kleist, resuming the offensive, fell upon the flank and rear of the French army, and carried several batteries at the point of the bayonet. The conscripts fled in all directions, nor did they rally again in numbers, for several days after the battle. Forty-six pieces of cannon, 50 waggons, and nearly 2000 prisoners, fell into the hands of the Prussians. Buonaparte made his dispositions for a regular and general attack on the morning of the 10th. General Charpentier seized the village of Clacey, on the left of the allied position, and a wood in its vicinity, was taken and re-taken several times. About an hour before sunset, the village of Semilly was again attacked; here two Prussian battalions, belonging to the corps of General Bulow, were posted, and being supported by two cross fires on each flank, the murderous discharge was found so destructive, that this last effort was at length abandoned. A retreat was now ordered; and the French army, after sustaining a dreadful loss, fell back, without molestation, in the direction of Soissons. In vain did Buonaparte attempt to palliate the serious check which he had experienced at Laon. Nothing could now escape the attention of the public; the truth soon became known; and the retreat from before the capital of the department of the Aisne, destroyed the moral effect of the victories by which it was preceded. On the side of the Seine, the grand Austro-Russian army had availed itself of the diversion made by Marshal Blucher; after inflicting a severe defeat upon the corps under Marshals Victor and Oudinot, at Bar, Prince Schwartzenberg advanced again towards the French capital, and on the 4th of March once more established his head-quarters at Troyes. Thus, within the short period of a fortnight, were lost all the advantages so recently obtained over the invaders of France.

* The progress of the negociation had been retarded or accelerated according to the nature of military events. The allied sovereigns, anxious to ascertain Buonaparte's views and intentions, allowed his plenipotentiary at the congress to present a counter-proposition, stipulating only that it should correspond with the spirit and substance of the conditions already submitted. To afford time for the preparation of this document, some delay became necessary, and the 10th of March was fixed upon by mutual consent, as the period at which the final determination should be made.

In the mean time, the confederate sovereigns of Europe entered into a formal engagement, by which they covenanted to bring 600,000 men into the field. By this treaty, the high contracted powers engaged, that if Buonaparte should refuse to coincide in the propositions submitted to him, they would employ all the means afforded by their respective dominions in a vigorous prosecution of the war; that they would act in perfect concert for the purpose of procuring a general peace; and that Austria, Russia, England, and Prussia, should keep constantly in the field, to be actively employed against the common enemy, 150,000 men each. Britain, wishing to contribute in a manner the most prompt and decisive towards this great object, engaged to furnish a subsidy of five millions sterling, to be equally divided among the other three powers; reserving to herself, however, the right of furnishing her contingent in foreign troops, at the rate of 20*l.* sterling per annum for infantry, and 30*l.* for cavalry. The treaty finally stipulated that the league should continue for twenty years, and should extend also to such other powers as might determine to join the confederation. At the very moment when Buonaparte's pretensions were about to be laid before the congress at Chatillon, fortune again smiled upon him at Rheims; a victory in front of which put him in possession of this important city; upwards of 2,000 Russian troops were made prisoners, and a large quantity of cannon, baggage, and other trophies, fell into the hands of Napoleon. This, however, was his last triumph. From the 14th to the 16th of March, he remained at Rheims, expecting the result of the conferences at Chatillon, which had been delayed a few days longer than the time prescribed. On the 15th of March, the French plenipotentiary laid before the congress his master's counter-proposition. The ultimatum demanded that the Rhine should form the boundary of the French empire; that Antwerp, Flushing, Nimeguen, and part of Waal, should be ceded to him; and that Italy, including Venice, should form a kingdom for the Viceroy, Eugene Beauharnois. In addition to these claims, he demanded indemnities for Joseph Buonaparte, in lieu of the kingdom of Spain; for Jerome, who had lost Westphalia; for Louis, the Grand Duke of Berg; and finally, for the Viceroy as Duke of Francfort. To these demands the ministers of the allied powers replied, that the extent of dominion demanded by the French Emperor was incompatible with a system of equilibrium, and would confer power on France out of all proportion to the other great political bodies of Europe. The present, they held, was not an ordinary war—it was not undertaken for the purpose of obtaining territorial possessions—its object was not to enforce particular rights, but to defend the cause of the world, and to restore to the nations of Europe a durable peace. It had now, they perceived, become clear that no such peace could be made with Buonaparte, and that to continue the negociations under the present auspices would be to renounce the objects which they had in view, and to betray the universal confidence reposed in them. These considerations prevailed. Austria herself abandoned Buonaparte to his fate; and the congress was dissolved. At this decisive moment the allied sovereigns renewed their solemn engagements, never to lay down their arms till the great object of their alliance should be attained.

† On the 10th of March, Buonaparte reviewed his army at the gates of Rheims, and on the same evening Marshal Ney re-entered Chalons without striking a blow. The inhabitants of Chalons, misled by false accounts of important victories obtained by the French arms, spontaneously illuminated the town, and the municipal body repaired without delay to Rheims, to compliment the Emperor on the deliverance he had wrought for his country. At length the Grand Austro-Russian army, commenced a general movement of attack upon the corps of Marshal Oudinot and Macdonald, which were posted between Melun and the Aube, to cover the capital. The Emperor of Austria re-entered Troyes about the 13th of March; and on that day the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia repaired to the head-quarters of Prince Schwartzenburg at Aries, where the troops received orders to pass the Seine at Montereau. Thus, with not more than from 50 to 60,000 men, Buonaparte found himself between two armies each consisting of 100,000 men. On the 16th he put the main body of his army in motion, and on the following entered Epernay with an army of 40,000 men. From Epernay the French army advanced to Fere Champenoise, where M. D. Rurnigny arrived from Chatillon with intelligence of the dissolution of the Congress. This event caused a deep sensation in the army.

The Emperor Alexander, at length formed the determination to concentrate all the allied forces at Aries, and there to give battle. On the 19th the two armies were in sight of each other, and the 1st column of the French on commencing the attack found themselves opposed to a battery of 60 pieces of cannon, and 100 squadrons of horse. Against this impregnable barrier all their efforts were directed in vain. After the repulse of the French guard the retreating squadrons were pursued with extreme ardour by the cavalry of the allies. This sanguinary conflict terminated only with the day; both armies remained on the disputed ground; and the field of battle was covered with the bodies of the slain.

At day break on the 21st, Buonaparte proceeded to reconnoitre the position of the Allies, and found to his surprise that their force had considerably increased. Aware of the necessity of striking a prompt and decisive blow, he had re-united with his troops the corps under Marshals Oudinot and Macdonald, and a large reinforcement of cavalry drawn from the army of Spain. These reinforcements were posted on the right bank of the Aube, and on the heights of Aries. The two armies remained in the presence of each other, ready for battle, till half past one o'clock; and in the interval, Buonaparte changed his plan several times, sent orders and counter-orders, but appeared, nevertheless, determined on a general battle. Much manœuvring was practised on both sides. On the 22d the whole of the grand allied army advanced towards the Marne, for the double purpose of interposing between the French army and the capital, and uniting with the force under Marshal Blucher. Buonaparte pushed on to St. Dizier, whence he dispatched a corps of cavalry, under General Piré, in the direction of Chaumont, with orders to seize on the road every courier, estafette, and carriage, which departed from Vesoul. Having thus cut off the line of communication of the allies, General Piré was enabled to intercept several ministers of state, and other persons of distinction, who were proceeding on missions to the head-quarters of the allied army. The seizure of these persons and their papers tended to develope the plans and objects of the allies to the enemy, but in his grand object, which was to capture Monsieur, Count d'Artois, who had recently arrived from England, and was known to be in the eastern provinces of France, he was happily disappointed. The Cossacks, always on the alert, intercepted a courier who had been sent to Paris with a letter from Buonaparte to his wife, disclosing the object of his movement on St. Dizier, and holding out flattering

Some weeks previously, a general suspension of hostilities had taken place; and, on the 30th of May, a definitive treaty of peace, between Great Britain and France, was signed at Paris. By this treaty, Malta was confirmed to this country; but France recovered all her colonies which she possessed in 1792, excepting St. Lucie, Tobago, and the Isle of France. On the day after the definitive treaty of peace was signed, the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia left Paris for England, where they arrived on the 6th of June, and remained till the 27th, when they returned to the Continent in order to proceed to Vienna, at which capital it had been determined to hold a general Congress of the European powers. Doubts were entertained by many, whether France would be willing to reinstate the Bourbons; and, from the matrimonial connection which existed flattering expectations regarding the final issue of the campaign. Being certain that Paris, and even the government itself, contained many persons who were discontented, and that the population of that capital were far from being disposed to take up arms and sacrifice every thing for a man who had imposed upon his country a military despotism, the confederated monarchs determined to effect a junction of the allied armies, to place themselves between the French army and Paris, and to march at the head of 200,000 men direct to the capital. On the 24th of March, Prince Schwartzenburg established his head-qumters at Vitry, and on the same day Field-marshal Blucher arrived with a large proportion of his army at Chalons. Generals Winzingerode and Czernichelf were now dispatched, with 10,000 horse, and 50 pieces of cannon, to observe the march of Napoleon on St. Dizier, and to menace his rear. The arrangements being complete, the King of Prussia issued orders to Marshal Blucher to direct his army on Paris; and on the 25th the Austro-Russian army faced about from Vitry, and took the same direction, by the route of Fere Champenoise, where a junction between the two armies was formed. A splendid and unforeseen advantage was about to mark this re-union. A column of 5,000 men had been dispatched from Paris, under the command of Generals Amey and Pactod, as an escort to an immense convoy of ammunition, and 100,000 rations of bread, intended for Buonaparte's army. Protected by Marshal Marmont's corps, this convoy had approached to Montmirail, and found, when it was too late, that it was impossible to escape the two grand armies of the allies, and after a most obstinate defence, they were obliged to surrender, with the whole of their cannon, ammunition, and stores.

The grand army, continuing its march, established its head-quarters at Conlommiers, on the 27th, having marched twenty-seven leagues in three days, and being now no more than thirteen leagues from Paris. The plan of the allied sovereigns was to concentrate the whole of their force on the right banks of the Marne and the Seine, and to attack Paris on the north, by taking a position on the heights of Montmartre. On the 28th they continued their progress to Meaux by the two roads of Ferte Gaucher and Montmirail, and on the evening of that day the allied sovereigns arrived in the neighbourhood of the French metropolis, without having encountered any formidable obstacle in their line of march. Hitherto, Buonaparte had displayed to his army the most invincible confidence in the final result of the campaign, considering the armies to which he was opposed as cut off in their retreat, and inclosed in the heart of France. Roused at length from this delusion, by intelligence received on the 27th, that the allied armies were marching directly on the capital, he advanced at the head of his army, by the route of Vitry, to the Aube. On the 29th, at day-break, the advanced guard was preparing to pass that river at the bridge of Doulancourt, when a courier arrived from Paris with dispatches. On the appearance of the courier Buonaparte alighted from his horse, in a small meadow on the borders of the Aube, where he hastily broke the seals of the packet, and put questions to the courier. The result of his answers and information proved, that on the preceding day, the allied armies were at Claye, five leagues from Paris, and that Marshals Marmont and Mortier, after having fallen back before the enemy, were making dispositions to defend the capital. All the hopes and favourable presages of Buonaparte were at once dissipated. Aware of the insufficiency of the means that existed for the defence of the capital, he foresaw the catastrophe which was about to destroy the great edifice of his power. He appeared to be subdued by his reverses. In this state he passed several hours at the bridge of Doulancourt, surrounded by his aides-de-camp and generals, and deliberating upon the course that was to be pursued. At length, he determined to apply to the Emperor of Austria, and for that purpose, he summoned into his presence Baron de Wissenberg, the Austrian minister, recently seized and made a prisoner near Chaumont. In the conference that ensued, he conjured the Baron to repair, without loss of time, to his imperial father, for the purpose of interceding in favour of Maria Louisa, and recommending his son, the King of Rome, to the tenderness and political influence of his august grandfather. Baron de Wissenberg repaired immediately to Dijon, but his mission, though seconded by a similar application through the medium of M. de Galbois, failed of success. The tempest hovered about the heads of the Parisians, and they expected soon to be crushed by the explosion. On Sunday the 27th of March, 6,000 regular troops, and 20,000 national guards, were ranged in battle array, and passed in review before the Thuilleries. In the morning of the 29th the allies removed their advanced posts towards Pantin, Villette, and the forest of Vincennes, harassing the French corps which were rallying under the walls of Paris. The troops left to defend the capital consisted of the remains of the corps which had fallen back before the allied armies, 5 or 6,000 regulars in garrison, commanded by Generals Compans and Ornans, and 30,000 national guards, of whom 8 or 10,000 at the most were fit for active service. This small army was under the immediate command of Joseph Buonaparte, assisted by Marshals Mortier and Marmont, and the Governor-general Hulin.

On the 30th of March, at two o'clock in the morning, Joseph Buonaparte gave a formal order for the defence of Paris, and the march of the national guards. Two hours afterwards the Parisians were roused from their beds by the beat of the drums. At the dawn of day two officers from the allied army presented themselves at the advanced posts of Marshals Marmont and Mortier, bearing a proclamation from the commander-in-chief to the inhabitants of Paris, in which they were told—"that there existed in the nature of the government which oppressed them an insurmountable obstacle to that peace which the allies had made so many attempts to obtain; that Europe in arms, now before their walls, sought only for a salutary authority in France, which might cement the union of all governments with her; that the inhabitants had only to declare themselves, and from that moment the allied armies would become the supporters of their decisions." The bearers of this proclamation were refused admittance; and every thing was prepared for a determined resistance on the heights of Paris. The fire of artillery commenced between five and six o'clock in the morning, and the engagement on the hills of Belleville and Saint-Chaumont, where the principal part of the French force was stationed, under Marshal Mortier, soon became very animated.

Marshal Blucher had not yet arrived on the field, and the resistance of the French began to render the issue of the contest doubtful. General Barclay de Tolly, the commander-in-chief of the Russian armies, judged it indispensable to bring the choicest of his troops at once into action, and thus, if possible, to decide the fortune of the day. The field of battle soon became covered with the dead, and the carnage presented on all sides a hideous spectacle. Joseph Buonaparte flattered himself that the seat of his brother's government would yet remain unconquered; but no sooner was he informed that the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia were at Bondy, and that their whole force was congregated in the vicinity of Paris, than he exclaimed—"In that case there is no alternative but to capitulate."

Towards Charonne, Belleville, Mesnil-Montant, and Saint-Chaumont, the allied troops had surmounted every obstacle. In every direction the French troops had been driven to the barriers, and the capital was about to be forced, when Marshal Marmont, on whom the command had devolved, dispatched an officer to General Barclay de Tolly to solicit a truce; engaging to abandon all the ground which he occupied beyond the barriers, and to sign a capitulation for the surrender of Paris in two hours. The Russian general lost no time in submitting this proposition to his imperial master, and to the King of Prussia, neither of whom had for a moment quitted the field of battle. These monarchs, animated by a desire to stop the effusion of blood, and wishing to preserve from ruin one of the first cities in Europe, agreed to the truce without hesitation, and ordered their armies to cease hostilities. Count Orloff, aide-de-camp to the Emperor of Russia, and Count de Paar, aide-de-camp to the Prince of Schwartzenberg, were charged with the office of regulating the cessation of hostilities, in concert with Colonel Denys, principal aide-de-camp to Marshal Marmont, and Colonel Baron Fabrier, attached to his staff. A shout of "capitulation!" now resounded on all sides; the thunders of the artillery had already ceased; and the Emperor of Russia and King of Prussia repaired to the heights of Belville, where they surveyed the capital of France, and received its deputies. At four o'clock in the afternoon Count de Nesselrode entered the city, furnished with full powers to ratify the capitulation, which was concluded at two o'clock in the morning of the 31st of March.

Buonaparte arrived at Troyes at eleven o'clock at night on the 29th, having exhausted his troops by a march of 20 leagues that day. He dispatched General Girardin, his aid-de-camp, during the night, with orders diametrically opposite to those of which General Dejean had been made the bearer from the bridge of Doulancourt. These last dispatches contained positive commands to defend Paris by all practicable means, assuring the ministers, that in twelve hours after the arrival of his aid-de-camp, himself and his army would enter Paris. Early in the morning of the 30th Napoleon left Troyes at the head of his guard, taking the direction towards Sens. But so great was his impatience, that he quitted his army at the distance of five leagues from Troyes, and with an escort of 1,500 cavalry, selected from his horse-guards, proceeded with the utmost rapidity to Fontainebleau, and in the night of the same day arrived at Cour de France, about four leagues from the capital. Assuming an air of tranquillity, he awaited, at an inn, the return of his aid-de-camp from Paris. With every exertion General Girardin was not able to reach Paris till the armistice had taken place, and till all hopes of preventing the entrance of the allies were completely dissipated.

Early in the morning of the 31st, the intelligence reached Buonaparte that his capital had capitulated, and that no efforts could now prevent the entrance of the allied armies into Paris. In this emergency he held a council with the officers by whom he was surrounded, consisting of the Duke of Vicenza, General Bertrand, and several others, at which it was determined that Buonaparte should repair to Fontainebleau, and there rally his army, while the Duke of Vicenza proceeded to the head-quarters of the allied monarchs, furnished with full powers to coincide in such conditions as the conquerors might be disposed to dictate.

The military government of Paris was confided to General Baron Sacken, and the propriety of this choice was manifested by the good order and tranquillity which prevailed in all quarters. The senate was the only body which possessed any authority; but this assembly thought itself crushed beneath the ruins of Buonaparte's throne, till a declaration on the part of the Emperor Alexander called it into action isted between Buonaparte and the house of Austria, it was considered that, though Buonaparte might be shorn of a portion of his power, and confined within narrower limits, the allies would not urge his actual dethronement. In several parts of France, however, the white flag was spontaneously hoisted; at Bourdeaux in particular, the English army was received with acclamations, and the Bourbons were proclaimed with the loudest demonstrations of joy. Buonaparte, at the same time, madly rejected the offers of the allies; and the general interests of Europe prevailing over the individual feelings of the Emperor of Austria, it was resolved, that Louis XVIII. should be restored to the throne of his ancestors. On this point, indeed, the voluntary acts of the French Senate and nation corresponded with the wishes of the allies. On the 31st of March, as already stated, the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia entered Paris; on the 1st of April, the senate established a provisional government; on the 2d they declared that Buonaparte had forfeited the throne of France; and, on the 5th, they formed and adopted a constitutional charter, by which Louis XVIII. was proclaimed King, and invested with all his hereditary rights. On the 20th of the same month, the long exiled monarch arrived in the British metropolis, where, from all ranks of society, he experienced the warmest, and most heartfelt congratulations. After a stay of three days, he left London for Dover, where he embarked for Calais; and, on the 3d of May, he made his public entry into the city of Paris.*

Great

tion, and gave it a new existence. This proclamation was no sooner promulgated, than the senators were suddenly convoked by Prince Talleyrand de Perigord, in his quality of vice grand elector. Sixty-five senators, assembled by this authority, on the 1st of April, threw off the imperial sway, and created a provisional government, charged with the office of re-establishing the functions and administration of the state. The installation of the provisional government was signalized by an address to the French armies, in which it was said:—"You are no longer the soldiers of Napoleon; the senate and all France release you from your oath." On the following day, the 2d of April, the senate decreed, that Buonaparte had forfeited the throne of France, and that the people, as well as the army, were released from the oath of fidelity. At the close of the sitting the members proceeded in a body to the Emperor of Russia, who, after receiving their homage, addressed them in these terms:—"A man, who called himself my ally, came as an unjust aggressor into my dominions. It is against him, and not against France, that I have carried on the war. I am the friend of the French, and you cause me to renew this declaration. It is just and wise that France should have strong and liberal institutions, commensurate with her present enlightened state. The allies and I have only come to protect the freedom of your decisions. As a proof of the durable alliance which I wish to contract with your nation, I restore to you all the prisoners now in Russia. The provisional government has solicited this of me; I grant it to the senate in consequence of the resolution which it has taken." Thus, by a splendid act of munificence, 200,000 French captives were restored without ransom, and returned from the extremities of Europe and Asia to the bosom of their families in France.

Marshal Marmont, in a correspondence with Prince Schwartzenberg, on the 3d of April, professed his readiness to accede to the decree by which Buonaparte was declared to have forfeited the throne of France, but he required as a guarantee—"That all troops quitting the standard of Napoleon should have leave to pass freely into Normandy; and that if the events of the war should place Buonaparte as a prisoner in the hands of the allies, that his life and safety should be guaranteed, and that he should be sent to a country chosen by the allied powers and the French government." To these demands Prince Schwartzenberg acceded, and Marshal Marmont, with his corps of 12,000 men, passed within the lines of the allies. In the mean time Buonaparte collected all his troops at Fontainbleau, amounting to 60,000 men, and announced, that it was his intention to march his army to the capital, and to repel the invaders. The struggle, however, had become hopeless, and the army had no disposition to sacrifice themselves, or to light up a flame of civil war, which might lay their country in ruins The Major-General Berthier was deputed to repair to the palace during the night of the 3d of April, and to recommend to Buonaparte the salutary measures of abdication. The first mention of this subject roused the natural irritability of his temper into rage; but when Marshals Ney, Oudinot, and Macdonald, who afterwards arrived, assured him that this measure alone could save the country, his spirit seemed subdued, and he consented to abdicate his throne in favour of his son, the infant King of Rome. This proposal it was determined to submit to the senate and the French nation, and on the 4th, Marshals Ney and Macdonald, accompanied by M. de Caulaincourt, were deputed to repair to Paris for that purpose. At the conference which ensued, Talleyrand, General Pozzo di Borgo, and others, attended, and the result was, that the Bourbon dynasty should be restored. At the breaking up of the conference Marshals Ney and Macdonald returned to Fontainebleau, where they arrived at eleven o'clock at night on the 5th. Ney was the first to enter the apartments of the palace, when Buonaparte inquired with earnestness if he had succeeded. "In part, sire," said the marshal, "but not with regard to the regency—it was too late. Revolutions never give way. This has taken its course, and the senate will to-morrow recognize the Bourbons." The marshal then proceeded to state, that the personal safety of the Emperor and his family had been stipulated for; that he would be permitted to retire to the Isle of Elba; and that a stipend of 2,000,000 of francs would be allowed for his annual expenditure. In virtue of these arrangements Buonaparte consented to the entire renunciation of his rights, and on the 6th of April announced his abdication in the following terms:—"The allied powers have proclaimed that the Emperor Napoleon is the only obstacle to the re-establishment of peace in Europe; the emperor, faithful to his oath, declares, that he renounces, for himself and his heirs, the thrones of France and Italy; and that there is no personal sacrifice, even that of life, which he is not ready to make for the interest of France."

* The operations of the allied armies in the south of France had produced, in succession, the defeat of the French army, and the capture of its magazines, the investment of Bayonne, Navarrens, and St. Jean Pied-de-Port, the passage of the Adour, and the possession of all the great communications upon that river; and the arrival of the nephew of Louis XVIII. in the south of France, favoured a revolution which had been some time contemplated. Lord Wellington, having made himself master of the whole extent of the French coast, from Bayonne to Bourdeaux, invited his Royal Highness the Duke d'Angouleme to his head-quarters at St. Sever; and soon afterwards a deputation from the royalists repaired to the British camp. His Lordship, yielding to the solicitations of the mayor, and other inhabitants of Bourdeaux, Marshal Beresford was authorised to move from Mont-de-Marsen upon that city, with a body of 15,000 men. At the report of the approach of Marshal Beresford, who was now rapidly advancing, the Senator Cornudet, the extraordinary commissary of Buonaparte, left the city, with the civil and ecclesiastical authorities, and his example was soon after followed by General Lhuillier, at the head of 2000 soldiers. The royalists, thus released from all restraint, awaited with confidence the arrival of the English army. M. Lynch, the Mayor of Bourdeaux, an ardent friend of the Bourbon family, had made every arrangement to receive the allies in a manner that should exhibit the most unequivocal proof of devotion to the exiled monarch; couriers were dispatched to meet Marshal Beresford; and deputies hastened to lay at the feet of his Royal Highness the Duke d'Angouleme the homage of the city. On the arrival of Marshal Beresford at the bridge of La Maye, in the morning of the 12th of March, Colonel Vivian was dispatched to the mayor, to announce that the British General hoped to enter a city favourably disposed to the cause in which he was engaged. The mayor returned the most solemn assurances of his friendship, and confirmed his declaration by hastening, at the head of a large body of municipal officers, to hail the arrival of the advancing army. The king's commissary, with a train of more than 10,000 inhabitants, accompanied the chief magistrate, and the rear of the procession was brought up by the Marquis de la Rochejaquelin, the brother of the unfortunate Vendean chief of that name. Advancing to the staff of the British army, the mayor addressed Marshal Beresford, who assured him, in the most impressive manner, that he considered the city which he was about to enter as the city of an ally, inhabited by the subjects of Louis XVIII. Scarcely had he uttered these words, when the mayor exclaimed—"Vive le Roi." The shout was instantly repeated with enthusiasm, both by the military and the inhabitants; while the mayor cast away his scarf, and resumed the ancient emblem of the French nation. At this moment the white flag was displayed from the steeple of St. Michael, and the white cockade was generally adopted with a spontaneous sentiment of satisfaction and joy. Shouts of "Long live the Bourbons"—"Honour to the English nation"—"Long live the Mayor," succeeded each other, and resounded through every quarter of the city. The people now became clamorous to see the illustrious descendant of Henry IV. the nephew of the King, and the husband of the daughter of Louis XVI. in the person of the Duke d'Angouleme, who was advancing from the head-quarters of Lord Wellington, accompanied by Count Etienne de Damas, the Duke de Guiche, and Count d'Escars. When the Duke entered the city the cries of Vive le Roi were renewed, and the transport exhibited by the inhabitants became unbounded. The crowd was so immense that two hours were scarcely sufficient to reach the cathedral, where the archbishop of Bourdeaux, at the head of his clergy, awaited the arrival of his royal highness, whom he addressed on the occasion. As soon as silence could be obtained, Te Deum was chaunted; and at the conclusion of the service the Duke returned to the Palais Royal, where he took up his residence. The presence of the nephew of Louis XVIII. served to convert into allies irritated nations, bearing the character of enemies till they reached the gates of Bourdeaux; the friendly ensigns of England, Spain, and Portugal, were now united with the oriflame—the signal for the restoration was given, and the short, but comprehensive sentences—"No more tyranny—no more war—no more conscription—no more vexatious taxes," uttered by the Duke d'Angouleme, and reiterated by the Mayor of Bourdeaux, gave a currency to the counter-revolution, which, like an electric shock, instantly extended its influence through the southern departments of France.

After the fall of Bourdeaux, that city, and the department of La Vendee, became the focus of royal insurrection, and Lord Wellington, pursuing his success, marched to the conquest of Languedoc. Early in the morning of the 10th of April, all the corps of the combined army were put in motion, while the French troops, ranged in battle array, prepared to make the most vigorous resistance. At seven o'clock in the morning the battle commenced, near the wharfs at the mouth of the canal, and soon became extremely animated. The attack soon spread along the whole line, and the battle became general. After a long and arduous contest, the allied army established themselves on three of the sides of Toulouse; and having turned the French army, compelled it to seek refuge in the city, and finally, to retreat

Great as the sufferings of France, in blood and treasure, were known to have been, the impoverishment of her finances was found to be still more deplorable than had ever been imagined. The increase of the debts of the state, in the course of 13 years, had amounted to 1,645,469,000 francs 71,989,269*l.*; and the total of anticipations, and misapplication of funds, by the Napoleon government, amounted to 1,305,469,000 francs, (57,114,269*l.*) In consequence of this distressing deterioration, the utmost economy in all the departments of state was found necessary; and new taxes, to a certain extent, and for a limited period, were ordered to be levied. Almost the only cheering circumstance developed in the Frence Exposé of July the 12th, was that the interests of agriculture were in a state of progressive improvement.

One of the first acts of the French provisional government was to facilitate the return of the Pope to his dominions; and, in gratitude to France, and kindness to all Europe, one of the first acts of his Holiness, was, to re-establish the Order of the Jesuits.

In Spain, one of the latest artifices of Buonaparte was that of proposing to liberate Ferdinand VII. on condition that he should deliver up certain garrisons to the French. By this means, the enemy would have been reinforced with 20,000 men, which might have proved an overmatch for Lord Wellington, and thus the spreading of the insurrection in favour of Louis XVIII. in the southern departments of France, would have been impeded. General Copons, however, managed the affair with great address, and succeeded in obtaining the person of Ferdinand, without acceding to the insidious demand of the French Ruler.

The liberated Ferdinand arrived at Gerona on the 24th of March, and great, enthusiastically great was the joy of the Spaniards throughout the kingdom. Their beloved sovereign was restored to their wishes; and their hearts cherished the reviving thought of peace, happiness, and security. Alas! how soon was the intoxicating chalice fated to be dashed from their lips! One of the first impulses of the "beloved Ferdinand" was to overturn the constitution which had been framed by the Cortes—to spurn his deliverers from his presence—to condemn the saviours of their country to exile, imprisonment, and death—to re-establish the Inquisition—and to encompass himself within a pestiferous swarm of bigotted priests and crime-diseased noblesse, the wretched remnants of his father's infamous court.

Very early in the year (January 14) the relations of peace and amity were restored between Great Britain and Denmark. The conditions of the treaty were highly favourable to the latter power. Britain was to restore all her conquests from Denmark, except Heligoland; prisoners of war on both sides to be released; Denmark to join the allies with 10,000 men, on receiving a subsidy of 400,000*l.* from England; and Pomerania to be ceded, by Sweden, to Denmark in lieu of Norway.

The cession of Norway to Sweden, however, led to violent commotions in the former country. These commotions were fomented, and, probably, first instigated, by Prince Christian, who caused himself to be elected and proclaimed King of Norway. In this instance, fortunately for humanity, the projects of an ambitious Prince were not suffered to prevail. Hostilities commenced between Sweden and Norway about the middle of July; by the latter end of August, Prince Christian was compelled to relinquish his claims; and, retreat from that place in the direction of Castelnaudry, leaving General D'Harispe, Bourot, and St. Hilaire, with 1,600 prisoners, in the hands of the victors. Of the numerous battles fought by Lord Wellington, in the south of Europe, the baule of Toulouse, which was the last of the campaign, and of the war, is among the most sanguinary; the engagement, which commenced at seven o'clock in the morning, did not cease till the same hour in the evening; and the number of the killed and wounded in the allied armies amounted to nearly 5,000. On the 11th of April Colonel Cook and Colonel St. Simon arrived at Toulouse with the intelligence that Buonaparte was dethroned; and the same information was conveyed with all possible dispatch to Marshals Soult and Suchet. For some days the French marshals did not consider the communication as sufficiently authentic to induce them to lay down their arms; and in the interval Sir John Hope was made prisoner by the enemy in a sortie from Bayonne; but the arrival of other messengers placed the fact of the overthrow of Buonaparte's government out of all doubt, and a convention was entered into by the commanders of the hostile armies on the same bases as the convention of Paris.

At the period of the restoration, Louis XVIII. was confined at his residence in England by sickness and infirmity; in consequence of which, his brother, the Count d'Artois, was appointed Lieutenant-General of France, and requested immediately to repair to the capital from Vesoul. On the 12th of April his royal highness made his public entry into Paris, surrounded by several of the great officers of the state, and attended by a group of French marshals. The enthusiasm with which the French people had now become animated was rapidly communicated to the Russian, Austrian, Prussian, English, Spanish, and Portuguese officers assembled in the church of Notre Dame, and it appeared as if all Europe, represented by a selection of warriors, swore on the altar, at the festival of the restoration, to maintain that peace which had been so happily and unexpectedly restored.

The regency at Blois, astonished at the rapid progress of the restoration, and overpowered by the intelligence of Buonaparte's abdication, was suddenly dissolved; and Maria Louisa and her son, placing themselves under the protection of Prince Esterhazy, retired, first to Switzerland, and afterwards to her paternal residence.

Buonaparte now found himself at Fontainbleau, with no troops but his guards, and those reduced to 2 or 3,000 men. The shock of his sudden overthrow had produced an attack of catalepsy, a disorder to which he was subject, and his departure for the Island of Elba was in consequence delayed. During his reverse of fortune he prepared himself for the last scene of his expiring power. Assembling his guards, he placed them in review, and thus addressed them:—"Generals, officers, and soldiers of my guard, I bid you farewel. I am satisfied with you. For twenty years I have always found you in the path of glory. The allied powers have armed all Europe against me; part of the troops have betrayed their duty, and France herself wishes for another dynasty. With you and the other brave men who have remained faithful to me, I could maintain a civil war for three years; but this would be a misfortune to France, and as such is contrary to the object I have ever had in view. Be faithful to the new King which France has chosen; and do not abandon this dear country which has been so long unhappy. Lament not my fate; I shall be always happy when I know that you are so. I might have died—nothing would have been more easy for me; but I will continue in the path of honour. I will write the history of our achievements. I cannot embrace you all, but I embrace your general. Bring me the eagle. Dear Eagle! may these kisses resound in the hearts of all my brave soldiers. Adieu, my children!" On the 20th of April, at noon, Buonaparte departed from Fontainbleau for Elba, accompanied by Generals Bertrand and Drouet, who retired with him to that island. The exiles were escorted on their journey by four superior officers, acting as commissioners to the allied powers, together with one hundred and fifty foreign troops, supported by detachments placed at a distance from each other.

The Emperor of Austria, who had hitherto remained at Dijon, made his entry into the French capital in great state on the 15th of April, and was received by the Emperor Alexander, the King of Prussia, and his Royal Highness the Count d'Artois. On the 23d a convention was signed between the allied powers and France, by which it was agreed that hostilities should every where cease; and that the allied armies should evacuate the French territory in fourteen days from that date; the boundary line to be observed being that which constituted the limits of France on the 1st of January, 1792. Fifteen days were allowed for mutual evacuations in Piedmont, and twenty days in Spain; the fleets were to remain in their then present stations, but all blockades were declared to be raised, and the fisheries and coasting trade were permitted. By this convention all prisoners were mutually and immediately liberated and sent to their respective countries. On the 2d of May the French King arrived at the castle of St. Ouen, a royal residence in the vicinity of Paris, where the members of the provisional council were admitted to an audience. Accompanied by the acclamations of the people from the frontiers of his kingdom to the gates of his capital, the impatiently expected monarch made his solemn entry on the 3d of May. The procession was headed by the marshals of France, the generals of the army, and all the officers of the court; accompanied by the national guards, and by detachments of the regular army. The King, dressed in a general's blue uniform, appeared in an open carriage, drawn by eight horses; on his left was placed the august daughter of Louis XVI. opposite to them were the Prince of Conde, and his son, the Duke of Bourbon; and Monsieur, and his son, the Duke of Berri, mounted on their chargers, took the right and left of the carriage. The procession entered the city amidst the reiterated shouts of the populace, and peals of artillery. All the windows in the streets through which they passed, up to the roofs, were filled with spectators, and the King saluted the crowd with the most gracious condescension and benignity. On entering the gates of Notre Dame, the royal personages were saluted by the thousand times repeated cry of "Vive le Roi!" The King alighted at the gates of the cathedral, and after receiving the holy water and incense, was addressed by the vicar-general in the name of the chapter:—"On entering my good city of Paris," said his Majesty in reply, "my first object was to thank God and his blessed mother, the Almighty Protectress of France, for the miracles which have terminated my misfortunes. I am a son of St. Louis, and will imitate his virtues." At the close of the ceremony the King repaired to the palace of the Thuilleries, and in presenting himself to the countless multitude assembled under the windows of his palace, he laid one hand on his heart, and raised the other towards heaven, as though to express, by a single gesture, that the acknowledgment which he owed to God, he would manifest by his love to his people.

subsequently subsequently to that period, the sceptre of Norway, with the full and free consent of the people, passed into the hands of the King of Sweden.

Soon after his return to Holland, the Stadtholder was declared Sovereign Prince of the Netherlands. The result of the negociation which took place between Great Britain and Holland, in the course of the summer, was, that this country should retain the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice, but restore Batavia, Surinam Curacoa, and St. Eustatia.—A negociation was also entered into, for uniting Great Britain and Holland more closely, by a marriage between the Prince of Orange and the Princess Charlotte of Wales, but—whether fortunately or unfortunately cannot now be ascertained—the issue was not successful.

On the 29th of March, the Prince of the Netherlands opened the grand meeting of the notables of the country, to take into consideration the plan of the constitution, which was viewed and adopted with acclamation. Decrees were also passed for the following purposes:—The establishment of the freedom of the press; the restoration of the Dutch language, which had fallen into disuse during the union of Holland with France; the relief of the inferior clergy; the solemn observance of the Sabbath, &c.

In the course of the summer, commissioners from America having arrived at Ghent, Commissioners were also appointed by the British government, at the end of July, to meet them. The avowed object of their meeting was, to negociate the terms of a treaty between the respective countries. Of the progress of their negociations, nothing was known in England until the middle and close of November. The arrival of various documents, from America, then disclosed the pretensions of the two governments; and, from the high tone of each, it seemed unlikely that an amicable close should be effected. All the bitterness of hostility was breathed by the ruling powers of the United States; and although it was found necessary, at a single blow, to double the entire taxation of the country, the strongest determinations appeared to have been made, to push the war with the utmost vigour, and to the last extremity. The negociations, however, were continued at Ghent; and, on the 24th of December, contrary to the expectations of most, they terminated in the signature of a treaty of peace.—Evil fortune had not ceased to pursue us in our naval contest with America. That ever the Americans were allowed to obtain a single victory over us upon our own element, was regarded, by many, as an indelible stain upon the naval administration of this country. The very ignorance, it was said, which induced them to oppose British ships of inferior force to the enemy, was guilt, of a dark shade. The consequences were indeed fatal and destructive, far beyond the limited loss of the ships and men which were thus sacrificed. The advantages which the enemy were allowed to gain increased their skill, raised their courage, and exalted their pretensions.—On land we were, to the last, more successful. The Americans were repeatedly beaten in Canada; and our capture of Washington, our descent upon Baltimore, and several other actions, were exploits which must have inspired no slight degree of terror.

Peace, as asw naturally to be expected, diffused an air of joy, and gladness, and exultation over the whole country. That, and the consequent arrival of the allied sovereigns, and their most distinguished Generals, converted the metropolis of England into a scene of gaiety and pleasure unprecedented within the memory of man. Illuminations, galas, and feasting were the order of the day. Nor were the provincial towns and villages backward or deficient in their demonstrations of joy.

The British Parliament, which assembled in the winter of 1813, principally for the purpose of voting those supplies by which the overthrow of Buonaparte was essentially promoted, adjourned on the 20th of December, and was not re-assembled till the 21st of March, 1814, when the allied armies were within a few days' march of their ultimate destination. The first business of importance, was a motion made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for a grant of 2,000,000*l.* on account of the army extraordinaries, making, with 3,000,000*l.* before voted, the sum of 5,000,000*l.*

On the 3d of May, Mr. Wilberforce moved that an humble address should be presented to the Prince Regent, beseeching him to interpose the good offices and interference of government with the allied powers on the Continent, to induce them to aid and assist in the desirable and humane object of abolishing the slave trade, by discontinuing and forbidding the same in their respective dominions. In these sentiments both sides of the House expressed their cordial concurrence; and, in consequence of the representations which were made to the French government, an engagement was entered into on the part of his most Christian Majesty, "to unite all his efforts to those of his Britannic Majesty, at the approaching congress, to induce all the powers of Christendom to decree the abolition of the slave trade, so that the said trade shall cease universally, as it shall cease definitively, under any circumstances, on the part of the French government, in the course of five years."*

A short time before the arrival of the royal visitors, by whose presence this country was honoured in the summer of the year 1814, the Princess of Wales received a letter from the Queen, acquainting her royal highness, "that she had received a communication from her son the Prince Regent, in which he states, that her Majesty's intention of holding two drawing rooms in the ensuing month having been notified to the public, he must declare that he considers that his own presence at her court cannot be dispensed with, and that he desires it may be distinctly understood, for reasons of which he alone can be the judge, to be his fixed and unalterable determination, not to meet the Princess of Wales upon any occasion, either in public or in private."

To this intimation the Princess of Wales replied, that "though she could not so far forget her duty to her King and to herself, as to surrender her right to appear at any public drawing room to be held by her Majesty, yet that she might not add to the difficulty and uneasiness of her Majesty's situation, she should in the present instance yield to the will of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, and should not present herself at the drawing rooms of the next month." The Princess next addressed a letter to the Prince, demanding to know what circumstances could justify the proceeding which he had thus thought fit to adopt? "I owe it," said she, "to myself, to my daughter, and to the nation, to which I am indebted for the vindication of my honour, to remind your royal highness of what you know, that, after open persecution and mysterious inquiries, upon undefined charges, the malice of my enemies fell entirely upon themselves; and that I was restored by the King, with the advice of his ministers, to the full enjoyment of my rank in his court. Upon my complete acquittal, since his Majesty's lamented illness, I have demanded, in the face of Parliament and the country, to be proved guilty or to be treated as innocent; I have been declared, what I am—innocent; and I will not submit to be treated as guilty. Sir, you may possibly refuse to read this letter, but the world must know that I have written it, and they will see my real motives for foregoing, in this instance, the rights of my rank: occasions however may arise (one I trust is far distant) when I must appear in public, and your royal highness must be present also. Can your royal highness have contemplated

* On the same day that Mr. Wilberforce made his motion respecting the Slave Trade, the Prince Regent conferred upon Field Marshal the Marquis of Wellington the dignities of Duke and Marquis of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, by the style and title of Marquis Douro and Duke of Wellington in the county of Somerset. To support the dignity thus conferred upon the Duke, the sum of 400,000*l.* was voted to him by Parliament; which, added to the sum of 100,000*l.* voted on a former occasion, swelled the amount of the grants placed at the disposal of the Duke to half a million sterling. At the same time, Sir John Hope was raised to the peerage under the title of Lord Niddry; Sir Stapleton Cotton was created Lord Combermere; Sir Thomas Graham, Lord Lynedoch; Sir Rowland Hill, Lord Hill; and Sir William Beresford, Lord Beresford; and the dignities of Lords Lynedoch, Hill, and Beresford, were accompanied by a grant of 2,000*l.* per annum each.

the full extent of your declaration? Has your royal highness forgotten the approaching marriage of our daughter, and the possibility of our coronation? The time you have selected for this proceeding is calculated to make it peculiarly galling; many illustrious strangers are already arrived in England, among others, as I am informed, the illustrious heir of the house of Orange, who has announced himself to me as my future son-in-law; from their society I am unjustly excluded; others are expected, of rank equal to your own, to rejoice with your royal highness in the peace of Europe; my daughter will, for the first time, appear in the splendour and publicity becoming the approaching nuptials of the presumptive heiress of this empire; this season your royal highness has chosen for treating me with fresh and unprovoked indignity, and of all his Majesty's subjects, I alone am prevented, by your royal highness, from appearing in my place to partake of the general joy, and am deprived of the indulgence in those feelings of pride and affection permitted to every mother but me." To the speaker of the House of Commons, her royal highness also addressed a letter, animadverting on the dangerous nature of the "fixed and unalterable determination of the Prince of Wales never to meet her on any occasion, either in public or private;" and inclosing, for the information of the House of Commons, the correspondence which had passed on this occasion. After the letters had been read, Mr. Methuen moved, "That an humble address be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, to pray his Royal Highness that he would be graciously pleased to acquaint the House, by whose advice he was induced to form the 'fixed and unalterable determination never to meet her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales upon any occasion, either in public or private.'" Ministers contended that it was not within the province of the House of Commons to interfere in this case; and the debate, which was carried on with closed doors, terminated in Mr. Methuen's consenting to withdraw his motion, from a hope that the rigorous proceeding announced against the Princess, would not be acted upon at the approaching drawing rooms. In this expectation the honourable gentleman was disappointed; but when the subject was again resumed on the 23d of June, Mr. Methuen, instead of insisting upon the indignity and injustice offered to the mother of our future sovereign, dwelt rather upon the necessity of increasing the establishment of her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales!

Lord Castlereagh observed, that it was the first time Parliament had been told that an increased provision for her Royal Highness was the object which her friends had in view. His Lordship proceeded to state, that he had no objection to submit to the House, on a future day, a proposal on this subject; and in conclusion adverted to a fact not before generally known, namely, that there is in existence an instrument dated in the year 1809, signed by the Prince and Princess of Wales, and approved by his Majesty, and to which his signature, as well as that of a large proportion of the ministers of the time, is applied, which provides for a distinct establishment for the Princess, and admits the fact of the separation. On the 4th of July, the House being in a committee, Lord Castlereagh rose to propose, that such an increase should be made to the income of the Princess of Wales as would enable her to maintain an establishment more suited to her situation in this country; and he thought the most desirable measure would be to raise it to that point to which it would be advanced in the event of the death of the Prince Regent; his proposal therefore was, that the net annual sum of 50,000*l.* should be granted to the Princess of Wales, and that the 5000*l.* and 17,000*l.* per annum which she at present enjoyed should be withheld from the Prince Regent's income. In a subsequent stage of this business, Lord Castlereagh called the attention of the House to a letter received by the chairman of the committee from the Princess of Wales, in which she intimated that it would be more satisfactory to her if the vote of the committee for an allowance of 50,000*l.* per annum was reduced to 35,000*l.* This suggestion, after some discussion was adopted.*

After the departure of the royal visitors, from the British metropolis, the Parliamentary session, which had suffered a temporary interruption, was resumed; and on the 26th of June, the speaker of the House of Commons informed that assembly, that he had received a letter from Lord Cochrane, protesting his innocence of certain charges exhibited against his Lordship, and of which he had, on the 8th of the present month, been convicted in the court of King's Bench.† When the matter came under consideration on the 5th of July, the House of Commons adjudged, by a majority of 140 to 44 voices, that Lord Cochrane should be expelled from that assembly; but the electors of Westminster, under the persuasion of the perfect innocence of their representative, re-elected his Lordship, not only without opposition, but in triumph.

The national income and expenditure, were, on the 13th of June, brought under the consideration of the House of Commons. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated the several sums necessary to be raised for the service of the year, the ways and means to defray those charges, and the terms on which the loan had been contracted for. The whole amount of the joint and separate charges for England he stated at 67,517,478*l.* and for Ireland, at 8,107,094*l.* making the total expence of the year 75,624,572*l.*

To meet the charges upon the public revenue, the taxes and the loans of the year for England would produce 67,708,545*l.* The exports of the past year had very considerably exceeded those of the most flourish-

* The Princess Charlotte of Wales, it was understood, had espoused the cause of her mother, and it was probably in some degree owing to this circumstance that she was kept very retired and private. It was determined, however, that she should marry. The person fixed upon as her husband was the young Prince of Orange; but it does not appear that he was ever very acceptable to his intended consort; and the negotiation was broken off. The Princess Charlotte naturally looked to her mother for protection and advice. This served still more to widen the breach; and all the principal persons about her Royal Highness were removed, either because they were suspected of forwarding her views, or because they wanted either the power or the inclination to exercise that influence over her, which was deemed necessary in order to render her more obedient to the will of her father. On the 12th of July, at the moment when the Prince was engaged at Warwick house, the residence of the Princess Charlotte, giving instructions to those who had superseded her discarded attendants, the Princess took an opportunity of leaving the house in a private manner, and, throwing herself into a hackney coach, ordered the driver to convey her to her mother's residence at Connaught house. The Princess of Wales immediately drove to the House of Parliament to consult her friends as to the proper course to be pursued: and the result was, that at three o'clock the following morning the Princess Charlotte was prevailed upon to accompany her uncle, the Duke of York, to Carlton house. After remaining at that place for some time, she was removed to Cranbourn Lodge, in Windsor Forest, where she was placed under the superintendence of the household recently appointed. Soon afterwards the Princess of Wales asked, and readily obtained, permission from the Prince Regent and his ministers to leave this country; and, on the 9th of August her Royal Highness embarked at Worthing in the Jason frigate, and after having paid a visit to her brother at the court of Brunswick, she proceeded to Italy, every where receiving the honours due to her rank, and on the approach of winter fixed her residence at Naples.

† The charges preferred against Lord Cochrane were, that he, along with Captain Random de Berenger; the Hon. Andrew Cochrane Johnstone, his Lordship's uncle; Richard Gathorne Butt, a stock broker; Ralph Sandom, a spirit merchant, at North Fleet; Alexander Mc Rae; John Peter Holloway; and Henry Lyte; had conspired to defraud the members of the stock exchange, by circulating, on the 11th of February last, false news of Buonaparte's defeat and death, to raise the funds to a higher price than they otherwise would have borne, to the injury of the public, and for the benefit of the conspirators. Of this offence Lord Cochrane, and the other defendants, were found guilty; his Lordship, however, continued after his conviction, to declare his intire ignorance of the plot and conspiracy imputed to him, and earnestly implored a new trial. This indulgence the rules of the court did not allow; and on the 21st of June, his Lordship, with Mr. Butt, was sentenced to pay a fine of 500*l.* to the King, to be imprisoned twelve months, in the custody of the Marshal of the Marshalsea, and during that time to stand one hour in, and upon the pillory, in front of the Royal Exchange. The same sentence was pronounced on Captain de Berenger, with the exception of the fine; and Sandom and Lyte were ordered to be imprisoned twelve months. Mr. Cochrane Johnstone, and Mr. Alexander Mc Rae, failed to appear. The punishment of the pillory was remitted by the crown.

ing year at any former period. The total amount of the loan for 1814 was twenty-four millions, being 18,500,000*l.* for England, and 5,500,000*l.* for Ireland, and from the terms upon which the loan had been negociated, it might be calculated that the public would remain charged with the yearly interest upon it of 4*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.* per cent. At the close of this statement the usual resolutions were read and agreed to, after a remark from Mr. Ponsonby, that the public interest demanded that the property tax should not be collected after the 5th of April next. Apprehensions however were still entertained that the tax might be renewed, and the inconclusive replies given by government to the inquiries made on that subject, excited a very deep and general alarm throughout the country. The first place which took measures to petition Parliament against the renewal of the tax was the city of London; and the example of the metropolis was so generally followed, that the voice of the people, which, when distinctly and perseveringly raised, must always be heard, finally prevailed.* Parliament was prorogued on the 30th of July.

On the 25th of September, the Emperor of Russia, and the King of Prussia, made their solemn entry into Vienna; but it was not till the 1st of November that the formal installation of the congress took place. The royal personages congregated on this occasion consisted of the Emperors of Russia and Austria, and the Kings of Prussia, Denmark, Wirtemberg, and Bavaria; with ambassadors from England, Russia, Austria, Prussia, France, Spain, Portugal, Switzerland, Italy, and the minor states of Germany. One of the first acts of the congress was to recognize a new regal title annexed to the British crown, and to confirm to Hanover the rank of a kingdom.†

In Italy, the territories formerly possessed by the sovereign house of Sardinia were restored to Victor Emanuel; and by a protocol, signed in the congress of Vienna, on the 14th of December, the territory forming, before the French revolutionary wars, the venerable republic of Genoa, was definitively united to the states of his Sardinian Majesty. The annexation of all the other districts in the north of Italy to the Austrian dominion, followed almost as a matter of course.

A. D. 1815.] Seldom have the changes wrought by time been so rapid, numerous, or important, as at this period of our history; affecting every clime, every state, and almost every individual of our species. The disturber of Europe, determined on one more desperate effort, again stood forward to alarm, and, it might almost be said, to appal the surrounding nations. Idly pretending that he had been neglected in his exile—that the contract into which the allies had entered with him had been broken, Buonaparte, on the 20th of February, laid an embargo upon all the vessels in the ports of Elba, assembled his guards, and declared his purpose of contending for the imperial crown of France. He embarked in four vessels, with about eleven hundred men, on the 28th of the month; and, on the 1st of March, he effected a landing near Cannes. In four days, the astounding news reached Paris. Monsieur, the King's brother, immediately set off from Paris, with Marshal Ney, who, in the enthusiasm of his loyalty, kissed the hand of Louis, and swore to bring his old comrade to the capital in an iron cage! How well he proved his loyalty, how religiously he kept his oath, is known to all. His Majesty, at the same time, convoked an extraordinary meeting of the legislative body, which instantly voted addresses, and declared their inviolable attachment to the throne. Confiding in the army, the King and his ministers adopted such measures as seemed best calculated to insure the public safety; but, unfortunately, the army was rotten at the very core, and the march of the rebel was unresisted. Followed by his little troop, with drums and music, four field pieces, and a superb carriage, Buonaparte set off from Cannes on horseback. Arriving within a league of Grasse, he found the inhabitants of that place in great agitation; and, deeming it imprudent to enter, he left his field pieces, and his carriage, at the gate, and took the road to St. Vallier. The garrisons at Grenoble and Lyons deserted to the rebel standard. At Grenoble, a large quantity of ammunition fell into the hands of Buonaparte, who pushed on, at the head of only six hundred horse, to Lyons, whence the disaffected troops had previously compelled Monsieur to retire. The same rebellious spirit appeared in other places. Marshal Ney, having issued a proclamation, dated March 14, describing the Bourbons as unfit to reign, and recommending his troops to join the great Napoleon, went over to Buonaparte, at Louis le Saulnier. Secure in the support of the army, Buonaparte proceeded on his march, and entered Paris on the evening of the 20th, exactly three weeks from the time of his sailing from Elba. Contrary, however, to the statements of the Moniteur, his entrance into the capital was effected in the most private manner. On the following morning, he shewed himself at a window in a garden of the Thuilleries, and, about noon, he reviewed the troops on the place Carousel. His most Christian Majesty, accompanied by Marshals Berthier and Macdonald, had previously left Paris for Lisle whither Monsieur and Marshal Marmont were also marching with a considerable force.

One of the first measures of the Usurper, on his return, was to dispatch his minion, Caulaincourt, to invite the Archduchess Maria Louisa to reunite her fortunes with his. For some time, the Parisians were amused with the expectation that their Empress would return. The imperial carriages were ordered from St. Cloud, to meet her and her son on their route from Vienna; their arrival was even announced; but neither the Empress of France, nor the King of Rome, appeared. An attempt to kidnap the baby-monarch proved also unsuccessful.

In the declaration of the allied powers, dated from Franckfort, on the 1st of December, 1813, appeared the following passage:—"The allied powers will not lay down their arms, until they have attained this great

* The state of the sister kingdom had for some time been such as to call for the adoption of additional measures for securing the public tranquillity, and on the 8th of July, Mr. Peel, chief secretary for Ireland, rose to propose the renewal of a measure, which had received the sanction of Parliament in 1807. The clause of the insurrection act, which it was now intended to revive, provided, that in case any part of the country should be disturbed, or in danger of becoming so, two justices of the peace should be impowered to summon an extraordinary sessions of the county, which should consist of seven magistrates; that the Lord Lieutenant, in council, on receiving a report from the magistrates so assembled, stating that the district was in a state of disturbance, and that the ordinary law was inadequate to the preservation of the public peace, should be impowered to issue a proclamation, commanding all resident within the same district to keep within their houses from sun-set to sun-rise; that no person should be suffered to remain drinking in a public house after nine o'clock at night; and further, if any persons should be detected out of their houses at the prohibited times, without being able to show good cause, they should be liable to be transported for the term of seven years. It was also required that the Lord Lieutenant should order a special session of the peace to be held, at which the persons offending against this law should be tried, and if necessary, the trial by jury should in these cases be dispensed with. Other provisions sanctioned the employment of the military; enabled the magistrates to pay domiciliary visits; and to break open doors if denied admission. The bill was warmly discussed in its several stages, but it ultimately passed both branches of the legislature, and at the close of the session obtained the royal assent.

† On the 12th of October, Count Munster, the Hanoverian minister of state, presented a note to the Austrian and other ministers, assembled at Vienna, for the purpose of conveying the declaration of the Prince Regent of Great Britain and Hanover, regarding the title which he had thought it necessary to substitute for that of Elector of the Holy Roman empire. The title of Elector, it was observed, had been rendered unsuitable to present circumstances, by the sixth article of the treaty of Paris, by which it was agreed—"that the states of Germany should remain independent, and joined in a federal union." On this ground, several of the powers concurring in the treaty had invited the Prince Regent to renounce the ancient title, and in its stead to assume the title of King, by which the arrangements required for the future welfare of Germany would be facilitated. The declaration proceeded to observe, that all the ancient electors, and the house of Wirtemberg, having erected their states into kingdoms, the Prince Regent could not derogate from the rank which Hanover had held under the house of Brunswick Lunenburgh, one of the most ancient and illustrious in Europe, before the subversion of the German empire; and that he had, therefore, resolved to erect his provinces, formerly the country of Hanover, into a kingdom, and to assume for its sovereign the title of King of Hanover.

and beneficial result,—a state of peace, which, by a wise partition of strength, by a just equilibrium, may henceforth preserve their people from the numberless calamities which have overwhelmed Europe for the last twenty years.—They will not lay down their arms until the political state of Europe is re-established —until our immoveable principles have resumed their rights over vain pretensions, until the sanctity of treaties shall at last have secured a real peace to Europe."—It was important; that the declaration from which we have taken this passage, had never been rescinded: it was found to be still binding, and in full vigour. In fact, every thing which had been effected since the date of the document had been in virtue of its stipulations: the Congress of Vienna was one of its consequences, and the union of the contracting parties was another.

As soon as the intelligence of Buonaparte's irruption had reached Vienna, the allied powers issued a solemn manifesto, in which they declared, that, by thus breaking the convention which had established him in the island of Elba, Buonaparte had destroyed the only legal title on which his existence depended; that, by appearing again in France, with projects of confusion and disorder, he had deprived himself of the protection of the law, and had manifested to the universe, that there could be neither peace nor truce with him; that he had placed himself without the pale of civil and social relations; and that, as an enemy and disturber of the tranquillity of the world, he had rendered himself liable to public vengeance. The allies, at the same time, expressed their firm determination to maintain entire the treaty of Paris, of May 30, 1814, and to employ all their means, and unite all their efforts, to prevent the peace of Europe from being again troubled. This declaration was followed by a new treaty, signed at Vienna, on the 25th of March, by which the contracting parties solemnly engaged not to lay down their arms but in agreement with each other; nor until Buonaparte should be wholly and completely deprived of the power of exciting disturbances, and of renewing his attemps to obtain the supreme power in France.

About a fortnight after his return to Paris (April 4,) Buonaparte endeavoured to cajole the allied sovereigns, by addressing to them, respectively, what was misnomered a pacific letter: at the same time, he, through the medium of Caulaincourt, made overtures, equally ambiguous, to the different foreign ministers; but these attempts proved as unavailing as those for the recovery of his wife and son. He seemed to have no resource but that of throwing himself into the arms of the old ferocious jacobins—the sanguinary survivors of the reign of terror. The cause of the Bourbons was strong in the south of France, and in several other parts of the empire; and, though in the capital, and in the midst of his military adherents, the Usurper felt himself surrounded by difficulties of no ordinary kind. He loitered so long at Paris, that, by some, it was questioned, whether it were his intention, personally, to take the field at all. In the interim, the allies, who were thus enabled to make their election of the seat of war, were, from all points, converging their forces towards one grand focus. However, his new constitution, and his splendid national spectacle of the Champ de Mai—which did not take place, till the 1st of June—having failed, in a great measure, of their intended effect, he left Paris on the 13th of June; and, by one of those lightning-like movements, by which his career has been so frequently distinguished, he joined his army, and put it in motion, in the neighbourhood of Brussels, on the 15th.* On the 18th—a day to be eternally remembered, with honour, in the annals of Britain—the doom of Buonaparte was sealed! During the 16th and 17th, the advantage appears to have been on the side of the enemy: but, on the 18th, his rout was dreadful, bloody, and decisive.† The field of action was small; not exceeding two miles from north to south, from the rear of the British to the rear of the French position; and from east to west, from the extremity of the left wing to that of the right of the contending armies, it was scarcely a mile and a half. The confined extent of the ground, and the consequent intermixture of the contending armies, is supposed to

* "Buonaparte," observes the Duke of Wellington, in his official dispatch to Lord Castlereagh, dated Waterloo, June 19, 1815, "having collected the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 6th corps of the French army and the imperial guards, and nearly all the cavalry on the Sambre, and between that river and the Meuse, between the 10th and 14th of the month, advanced on the 15th, and attacked the Prussian posts at Thuin and Lobez, on the Sambre, at day light in the morning. I did not hear of these events till the evening of the 15th, and I immediately ordered the troops to prepare to march; and afterwards to march to the left, as soon as I had intelligence from other quarters to prove that the enemy's movement upon Charleroi was the real attack. The enemy drove the Prussian posts from the Sambre on that day; and General Zieten, who commanded the corps which had been at Charleroi, retired upon Fleurus; and Marshal Prince Blucher concentrated the Prussian army upon Sombref, holding the villages in front of his position of St. Amand and Ligny. The enemy continued his march along the road from Charleroi towards Brussels, and on the same evening, the 15th, attacked a brigade of the army of the Netherlands, under the Prince de Weimar, posted at Frasne, and forced it back to the farm house on the same road, called Les Quatre Bas.—The Prince of Orange immediately reinforced this brigade with another of the same division, under General Perponcher, and in the morning early regained part of the ground which had been lost, so as to have the command of the communication leading from Nivelles and Brussels, with Marshal Blucher's position. In the mean time I had directed the whole army to march upon Les Quatre Bras, and the 5th division under Lieutenant-General Sir T. Picton, arrived at about half past two in the day, followed by the corps of troops, under the Duke of Brunswick, and afterwards by the contingent of Nassau. At this time the enemy commenced an attack upon Prince Blucher with his whole force, excepting the 1st and 2d corps, and a corps of cavalry under General Kellerman, with which he attacked our posts at Les Quatre Bras. The Prussian army maintained their position with their usual gallantry and perseverance, against a great disparity of members, as the 4th corps of their army, under General Bulow, had not joined, and I was not able to assist them as I wished, as I was attacked myself; and the troops, the cavalry in particular, which had a long distance to march, had not arrived. We maintained our position also, and completely defeated and repulsed all the enemy's attempts to get possession of it. The enemy repeatedly attacked us with a large body of infantry and cavalry, supported by a numerous and powerful artillery: he made several charges with the cavalry upon our infantry, but all were repulsed in the steadiest manner. In this affair his Royal Highness the Prince of Orange, the Duke of Brunswick, and Lieutenant General Sir T. Picton and Major General Sir James Kempt, and Sir Denis Pack, who were engaged from the commencement of the enemy's attack, highly distinguished themselves, as well as Lieutenant General Charles Baron Alten, Major-General Sir C. Halket, Lieutenant-General Cooke, and Major-Generals Maitland and Byng, as they successively arrived. The troops of the 5th division and those of the Brunswick corps were long and severely engaged, and conducted themselves with the utmost gallantry. I must particularly mention the 28th, 42d, 79th, and 92d regiments, and the battalion of Hanoverians.—Our loss was great, as your Lordship will perceive by the inclosed return, and I have particularly to regret his Serene Highness the Duke of Brunswick, who fell, fighting gallantly at the head of his troops. Although Marshal Blucher had maintained his position at Sombref, he still found himself much weakened by the severity of the contest in which he had been engaged, and as the 4th corps had not arrived, he determined to fall back, and concentrate his army upon Wavre; and he marched in the night after the action was over. This movement of the Marshal's rendered necessary a corresponding one on my part; and I retired from the farm of Quatre Bras upon Gemappe, and thence upon Waterloo, the next morning, the 17th, at ten o'clock."

† Buonaparte appears to have considered victory, on the side of the French, as absolutely certain. Amongst his baggage were found several bales of proclamations, dated June 17th, from "Our palace of Lacken" (a royal residence near Brussels) as follows: "The ephemeral successes of our enemies detached you, for a moment, from my empire. In my exile upon a rock in the sea, I heard your complaints. The God of battles has decided the fate of your beautiful provinces; Napoleon is amongst you; you are worthy to be Frenchmen; rise in a mass, join my invincible phalanxes, to exterminate the remainder of these barbarians, who are your enemies and mine; they fly with rage and despair in their hearts."

The trickery that was played off, to induce a belief that Buonaparte had gained a great victory, even before the battle had been fought, was, in the event, truly ludicrous. Emissaries were employed at the Hague, Antwerp, Brussels, and many other places in Flanders and Holland, to report that the allies had been completely defeated; and the Journal of Lisle actually contained the following Bulletin Extraordinary:

"Valenciennes, June 19th, in the Evening.

"They say the Emperor fired the first carbine: that he gave the example, and had a horse killed under him; on the 15th, 16th, and 17th, he gained astonishing victories, which were exceeded by that of yesterday, the 18th, on which day he took 30,000 prisoners. The wounded who have come here arrived crying Vive L'Empereur! and say they longed to be cured, that they may be able to return to fight; but for the excessive ardour of his troops, the Emperor would have surrounded and taken prisoners the whole Prussian army. They write from Maubeuge, on the 19th, that our troops have entered Mechlin and Brussels! Another paper says, 'We hear the cannon roar from the ramparts of the cities of France, to celebrate the taking of Brussels by the grand French army!'"

BATTLE OF WATERLOO.

Published by J. Roberts & Co. Albion Press London 1820

have occasioned, in some measure, the horrible carnage of the battle. The French position is said to have been decidedly the best; the eminence which they occupied being higher, and the ascent steeper than ours, and better adapted both for attack and defence. The entire force, under the command of the Duke of Wellington, divided into two corps, previously to the battle, was about 94,500; of which 76,000 were infantry, 13,500 cavalry, and 5,000 artillery. From various causes, however, his effective force, on the 18th, is said to have scarcely amounted to 64,000. The French army, chiefly composed of veteran troops, was 130,000 strong. After some skirmishing between the piquetts, the French commenced the engagement about 10 o'clock, with a furious attack upon the post at the wood and garden of Chateau Hougoumont. Buonaparte directed the charge of the French Imperial Guards; but, during this important day, on which his political, if not his physical existence, might be thought to depend, he did not appear at the head of his troops.* Never, "observes a contemporary writer," was there an attack more tremendous, nor a resistance more firm, unshaken, and triumphant. The French army, infuriated by despair, animated by the promised plunder of Brussels, and filled with perjured traitors, who had betrayed their King and country, and who knew that their lives and fortunes depended on success, fought from first to last, with the desperation of madness. But they could not wrest victory from the hands of the British." Of forty thousand French cavalry, not ten thousand capable of service, returned; and of an immense artillery, only twelve pieces were saved. On the part of the allies, also, the loss was dreadful. The carnage is said to have exceeded even that which was produced by the battle of Leipsic.†

Buonaparte, quitting his carriage, escaped on horseback! He again deserted his army; again fled; and, with his accustomed velocity of movement, he reached Paris, and entered his palace, at 11 o'clock, on the night of the 21st. He immediately convoked the council of ministers, to confer with them on the means of replacing the "materiel" of the army. This was immediately announced to the two chambers, in which much tumultuary discussion ensued; the sittings of the chambers were declared permanent; Buonaparte was called upon to abdicate! and a deputation was sent to him, with a message to that effect. Buonaparte was at the palace Elysée. A multitude of persons assembled round the palace, and a faint cry of "Vive l'Empereur" was heard. The impatience of the assembly of deputation was at its height. A message was sent to them, from the council, to say, that in six hours a communica-

* Walter Scott, in his notes to "The Field of Waterloo," and various other writers, have produced abundant evidence, in proof that Buonaparte did not appear at the head of his guards; on the contrary, he was, much to the chagrin and disgust of such parts of his army, as were acquainted with the circumstance, in places of personal safety, during the whole of the battle.

† The Duke of Wellington, in his official dispatch, already quoted from, having stated his falling back upon Waterloo, on the morning of the 17th, observes as follows:—"The enemy made no effort to pursue Marshal Blucher. On the contrary, a patrole which I sent to Sombref in the morning, found all quiet, and the enemy's videttes fell back as the patroles advanced. Neither did he attempt to molest our march to the rear, although made in the middle of the day, except by following with a large body of cavalry, brought from his right, the cavalry under the Earl of Uxbridge. This gave Lord Uxbridge an opportunity of charging them with the 1st Life Guards, upon their debouche from the village of Genappe, upon which occasion his Lordship has declared himself to be well satisfied with that regiment.

"The position which I took up in front of Waterloo, crossed the high roads from Charleroi and Nivelle, and its right thrown back to a ravine near Merke Briane, which was occupied; and its left extended to a height above the hamlet Ter La Haye, which was likewise occupied.—In front of the right centre, and near the Nivelle road, we occupied the house and garden of Hougoumont, which covered the return of that flank; and in front of the left centre, we occupied the farm of La Haye Sainte. By our left we communicated with Marshal Prince Blucher, at Wavre, through Ohain; and the Marshal had promised me that in case we should be attacked he would support me with one or more corps, as might be necessary. The enemy collected his army, with the exception of the 3d corps, which had been sent to observe Marshal Blucher, on a range of heights in our front, in the course of the night of the 17th and yesterday morning; and about ten o'clock he commenced a furious attack upon our post at Hougoumont. I had occupied that post with a detachment of General Byng's brigade of guards, which was in position in its rear; and it was for some time under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Macdonald, and afterwards of Colonel Home; and I am happy to add that it was maintained throughout the day with the utmost gallantry by those brave troops, notwithstanding the repeated efforts of large bodies of the enemy to obtain possession of it. This attack upon the right of our centre was accompanied by a very heavy cannonade upon our whole line, which was destined to support the repeated attacks of cavalry and infantry occasionally mixed, but sometimes separate, which were made upon it. In one of these the enemy carried the farm house of La Haye Sainte, as the detachment of the light battalion of the legion which occupied it had expended all its ammunition, and the enemy occupied the only communication there was with them. The enemy repeatedly charged our infantry with his cavalry, but these attacks were uniformly unsuccessful, and they afforded opportunities to our cavalry to charge, in one of which, Lord E. Somerset's brigade, consisting of the Life Guards, Royal Horse Guards, and 1st Dragoon Guards, highly distinguished themselves; as did that of Major-General Sir W. Ponsonby, having taken many prisoners and an eagle. These attacks were repeated till about seven in the evening, when the enemy made a desperate effort with the cavalry and infantry, supported by the fire of artillery, to force our left centre near the farm of La Haye Sainte, which, after a severe contest, was defeated, and having observed that the troops retired from this attack in great confusion, and that the march of General Bulow's corps by Enschermont, upon Planchnorte, and La Belle Alliance, had begun to take effect, and as I could perceive the fire of his cannon, and as Marshal Prince Blucher had joined in person, with a corps of his army to the left of our line by Ohain, I determined to attack the enemy, and immediately advanced the whole line of infantry, supported by the cavalry and artillery. The attack succeeded in every point; the enemy was forced from his position on the heights, and fled in the utmost confusion, leaving behind him, as far as I could judge, one hundred and fifty pieces of cannon, with their ammunition, which fell into our hands. I continued the pursuit till long after dark, and then discontinued it only on account of the fatigue of our troops, who had been engaged during twelve hours, and because I found myself on the same road with Marshal Blucher, who assured me of his intention to follow the enemy throughout the night; he has sent me word this morning that he had taken sixty pieces of cannon belonging to the Imperial Guard, and several carriages, baggage, &c, belonging to Buonaparte, in Genappe. I propose to move this morning upon Nivelles, and not to discontinue my operations.

"Your Lordship will observe, that such a desperate action could not be fought, and such advantages could not be gained, without great loss; and I am sorry to add, that ours has been immense. In Lieutenant General Sir Thomas Picton, his Majesty has sustained the loss of an officer who has frequently distinguished himself in his service, and he fell gloriously leading his division to a charge with bayonets, by which one of the most serious attacks made by the enemy on our position, was defeated.—The Earl of Uxbridge, after having successfully got through this arduous day, received a wound by almost the last shot fired, which will, I am afraid, deprive his Majesty fc some time of his services. His Royal Highness the Prince of Orange distinguished himself by his gallantry and conduct, till he received a wound from a musket ball through the shoulder, which obliged him to quit the field. It gives me the greatest satisfaction to assure your Lordship, that the army never, upon any occasion, conducted itself better. The division of guards under Lieutenant-General Cooke, who is severely wounded, Major General Maitland and Major-General Byng, set an example, which was followed by all; and there is no officer, nor description of troops, that did not behave well.—"

His Grace highly praises the other departments of his army, also: he likewise applauds the Prussians; and particularly the attack by General Bulow.

The Supplement to the Moniteur of June 21st, calculates the loss of the Prussians, on the 16th, at 16,000, that of the French, opposed to them, at 3,000, the loss of the English between 4 and 5,000, and that of the French, in this part of the field, at 4,200. Nothing particular occurred on the 17th, and the success of the great battle, which took place on the 18th, is declared to have been such, down to half past eight in the evening, as to have promised a brilliant triumph for the following day; but after this period, a panic terror, it is said, suddenly spread through the French army, which occasioned its total rout; nor was it expected to be rallied before it reached Avesnes or Philippville.

"At the end of the day," says the Moniteur, a charge directed against the flank of the cuirassiers, by several English squadrons, put them in disorder. Several regiments, near at hand, seeing some troops belonging to the guard in confusion, believed it was the old guard, and in consequence were thrown into great disorder. Cries of 'all is lost, the guard is driven back,' were heard on every side. The soldiers pretend, even that on many points evil disposed persons cried out, 'sauve qui peut.' A complete panic at once spread itself throughout the whole field of battle, and they threw themselves, in the greatest disorder, on the line of communications, soldiers, cannoneers, caissons, all pressed to this point: the old guard, which was in reserve, was infected, and was itself hurried along. In an instant, the whole army was nothing but a mass of confusion; all the soldiers, of all arms, were mixed pel-mel, and it was utterly impossible to rally a single corps. The enemy, who perceived this astonishing confusion, immediately attacked with their cavalry, and increased the disorder, and such was the confusion, owing to night coming on, that it was impossible to rally the troops, and point out to them their error. The squadrons placed on the side of the Emperor were disorganised and destroyed, by an overwhelming force, and there was nothing left, but to follow the torrent. The park of reserve, all the baggage, which had repassed the Sambre, in short, every thing in the field of battle, remained in the power of the enemy."

tion would be made to them. To which they replied, that they would only allow one hour for the determination. Upon which Regnault de St. Jean d'Angely, as the organ of the council of ministers, stated to Buonaparte, in plain but respectful terms, that the interests of France demanded "that his Majesty should abdicate the throne." Buonaparte said "What, do you say so? Et tu Brute!" To which Regnault answered, "Your Majesty may believe that it is with grief of heart that I announce to you the fatal necessity, but the well being of France demands this sacrifice at your hands." Napoleon then proposed to abdicate in favour of his son.—"My political life," said he, "is terminated, and I proclaim my son, under the title of Napoleon the Second, Emperor of the French." The chambers accepted the abdication, without the proclamation; and one Dubert produced considerable agitation in the Lower House, by affecting to consider Napoleon the Second as acknowledged, and that a council of Regency was to be appointed. Both chambers thanked Buonaparte for his resignation; and the following five persons were chosen from the two bodies, to exercise provisionally the functions of government—Carnot, Fouche, Caulaincourt, Grenier, and Quinette.*

This new government had just finished another new constitution, when the allied armies returned, to relieve them from their legislative labours! Profiting by the victory of Waterloo, Lord Wellington, in conjunction with the veteran Blucher, marched upon Paris; which, although it had been reinforced by 40 or 50,000 troops, who had escaped from Waterloo, surrendered, agreeably to a military convention, on the 3d of July. Amongst other stipulations, it was determined, that Paris should be completely evacuated in three days, and that the French army should retreat, and take up a position behind the Loire. A contribution, equal to about 400,000*l.* sterling, was levied on the inhabitants.

On the 8th of July, Louis XVIII. returned to his capital, and was soon afterwards joined by the Emperors of Austria and Russia, and the King of Prussia.† —It was not until the 7th of October, that the two French chambers, or grand council of the nation, corresponding with the British Parliament, were opened by Louis XVIII. His Majesty then formally announced, his having entered into a treaty or convention, with the allies; but it was not until the 20th of November, that the treaty received the final signatures of the contracting powers. From the several conventions of which the grand treaty was composed, it appeared that the restoration of peace had been effected upon the principle of securing to the allies indemnities for the past, and guarantees for the future; the indemnities to be partly territorial, and partly pecuniary. Eighteen fortresses were to be occupied, by 150,000 of the allied troops, at the expence of France, for a period not exceeding five years; and the pecuniary indemnity was settled at 700,000,000 francs. The respective conventions may be considered as having been sealed and cemented by the treaty of alliance, which was at the same time entered into by Great Britain, Austria, Russia, and Prussia, stipulating the maintenance of the grand treaty in all its vigour, and engaging to employ their united forces again, "should the same revolutionary principles, which supported the last criminal usurpation, again, under other forms, disturb France, and menace the repose of other states."

The French government, and the nation at large, could not but feel the severity of the terms imposed by the allies: a consciousness, however, of their justness, and of the necessity of submission, induced them to meet with firmness that which it would have been the height of folly to resist. Indeed, to the credit of the people, the stability of the government has evidently increased, ever since the nation became acquainted with the extent of the difficulties which it had to encounter.

On the 5th of January, 1814, the total net produce of the British revenue for the preceding year was found to be 62,957,371*l.* and on the 5th of January, 1815, it

* There were tumultuous debates on the 23d in the two chambers, upon Buonaparte's declaration, in answer to the address of the chambers, upon his abdication. His words were, "I repeat to you,—I have abdicated only for my son." In the Chamber of Peers, Lucien Buonaparte called those traitors, who had any other views.—Pontecoulant told him he was not a Frenchman, except by adoption, he was a Roman Prince. Being interrupted by Lucien, he desired him to set an example of equality. After much violent and clamorous discussion it was resolved:—

"1st. That Napoleon the Second is become Emperor of the French, by the act of abdication of Napoleon the First, and by the power of the constitution of the Empire.

"2d. That the two chambers desired and meant by their decree, in nominating a commission of Provisional Government, to assure to the nation the guarantee necessary under the extraordinary circumstances in which it is placed, for its liberty and repose."

In the chamber of representatives there were frequent shouts of Vive L'Empereur. Some members reprobated those, who wished to declare the throne vacant, for the purpose of bringing in the Bourbons. One member said that there was an Orleans faction, which wished to proclaim the Duke of Orleans; he knew it; but it was doubtful whether the Duke would accept the throne, or whether he would not surrender it to Louis XVIII. It was on the motion of the celebrated La Fayette, that the sittings of the Lower Chamber were declared permanent. In the course of the debates, Carnot having stated that the Imperial Guard had reached Rocroy, and that Soult was rallying the army, and had already collected 60,000 men on the frontiers, Ney started up, and flatly contradicted him. "It is time," said he, that the truth should be spoken. Instead of 60,000 men, it is utterly impossible to collect 25,000, and even those cannot again be brought to face the enemy, after such a defeat as thay have sustained. With respect to the Imperial Guard, I myself commanded it under the Emperor, and I aver that it is totally destroyed. Nothing remains to be done, but to treat for peace with the enemy.

† Buonaparte had passed through Tours, on the night of June the 30th, and reached Niort, on the morning of the 2d of July, in a common diligence, on his way to Rochfort. It is supposed that he intended to escape to America, but, measures having been taken to prevent his departure, he at length surrendered to the British ship, the Bellerophon, in which he arrived at Torbay, on the 24th of July, accompanied by General Bertrand, and others, to the number of about thirty-four. The determination of the British Government, in conjunction with the allies, appears to have been previously taken, as it was speedily known that St. Helena was the point of the Ex-Emperor's destination. Against this place in vain did he enter a formal protest.—Having been removed from the Bellerophon into the Northumberland, he sailed in the latter ship, from the Start, on the 7th of August: on the 24th of the same month, he touched at Madeira; and on the 15th of October, he arrived at St. Helena.

On the re-establishment of the kingly government in France, measures were taken for the arrest and punishment of the principal persons engaged in the late rebellion. Numerous individuals were seized, but few of them expiated their crimes with blood. Labedoyere, one of the minor criminals, was tried on the 14th of August, and shot upon the 19th of March. Though the treason of this officer was detested by the loyal part of his countrymen, there were few, we believe, who did not pity and commiserate his fall. To have pardoned him, would have been the worst of all possible policy; but, had his escape been connived at, thousands would have rejoiced; and, from the conduct which he displayed during his trial, and at the moment of his death, we cannot think so unfavourably of human nature, as to believe, that he would ever again have proved a traitor to his King. The trial of the arch traitor Ney, who had pledged himself to secure the wild beast in an iron cage, commenced, before a military tribunal, on the 16th of November; but, by dint of intrigue, and by the powerful interest which he enjoyed among the higher classes, the court-martial was announced imcompetent to try him, and he was consequently arraigned before the Peers. An attempt to rescue him from prison was defeated. His subsequent trial took place on the 4th and 5th of December; and, having been convicted of the treasonable charges alledged against him, he suffered the final execution of the law upon the 7th. Of him, it may be truly said, that his death was the best action of his life. It is probable, that the sacrifice of Ney was the means of saving the lives of many others, some of them almost his equals, but by far the greatest part his inferiors, in guilt. His death appears to have established the principle, that the government have a right, and also the power to exercise that right, over the lives of traitors. Lavalette, the Director-General of the post-office, who was tried, and convicted, November 20 and 21, had the good fortune to escape, through the conjugal heroism of Madame Lavalette; who, exchanging clothes with her husband in the prison, enabled him to depart in disguise. Lavalette, after he had quitted the prison, was further aided in his escape from the French territory, by the English General Sir Robert Wilson, Mr. Bruce, and Mr. Hutchinson. For this offence against the French laws, these gentlemen were arrested, put upon their trial, and condemned to three months' imprisonment.

Connected, in some measure, with the rebel movements of Buonaparte, appears to have been the perfidious advance of Murat, against Austria. Murat, however, was still more unfortunate than his master. He was defeated in his object of revolutionizing Italy; he failed in his attempt to cut his way through the Austrians, at Tolentino, on the 3d of May; and he arrived at his capital, just in time to escape from it in disguise. His army capitulated on the 21st of May; the populace of Naples rose against his family; and, on the 22d, at the entreaty of the inhabitants, the Austrians entered the city. Ferdinand the Fourth of Sicily was consequently restored to the throne of his ancestors.—Murat effected his escape to Toulon, where he remained some time in disguise; thence he proceeded to Corsica, and assembled a few hundreds of banditti, at the head of which, mimicking, as it were, his master, he again appeared in Italy. He was seized, almost at the instant of his arrival, and torn to pieces by the mob!

was 65,129,981*l.* In the former of these years, the property tax, that most inquisitorial and oppressive of all imposts, produced the immense sum of 13,965,803*l.* in the latter 14,218,333*l.* On the 1st of November, 1815, the total funded debt of the country was ascertained to amount to the sum of 819,145,384*l.* 18*s.* 5¼*d.* requiring an interest of 29,681,663*l.* 17*s.* 11*d.*

Agreeably to the terms of the act, the property tax was doomed to expire in the month of April; but, as suspicions were entertained—and the sequel proved that they had been justly entertained—that it was in the contemplation of ministers to continue it another year, meetings were convened all over the country, in deprecation of an evil so alarming and oppressive. Yielding to the just voice of the nation, the state financiers were compelled to abandon their intention; and they had actually made out a schedule of new and additional taxes, to the amount of 3,728,000*l.* as a partial supply for the deficiency to be occasioned by the extinction of the income duty, when, suddenly, the devastator of Europe burst forth from his exile, deranged the whole of their plans, and rendered the revival of that tax a measure of imperative necessity. The supplies demanded for the year were 79,068,112*l.*; and as it was not expedient, nor perhaps practicable, to levy new taxes, to make up the difference between the revenue and the expenditure, a loan of 27,000,000*l.* for England, and another of 9,000,000*l.* for Ireland, were resorted to.

One of the earliest measures of Parliament, which net on the 9th of February, was to take the corn laws into consideration. The opposition of the manufacturing and commercial interests was strong and violent; but, by a decisive majority, resolutions were at length passed for fixing the import price of corn at 80 shillings; that is to say, when British corn should average that price per quarter, foreign corn might be imported duty free. It was considered, by many, that this admission, without the embarrasment of duty, in any shape, was an improvement on what had hitherto been the custom in the operation of our corn laws; for, although foreigners were not, strictly speaking, the importers into Britain, yet, as they were accustomed to regulate their prices by the British prices, this would simplify their calculations. Respecting the effect of the measure upon the price of bread, experience has shown, that all alarm upon the subject was groundless; and the riots which occurred in the metropolis, and in some other parts of the kingdom, proved only that the question was not clearly understood.

In the political circumstances of the times, consequent on the irruption of the exile of Elba, nothing was more remarkable, nothing spoke so forcibly the sense of the nation, nothing gave such weight and importance to the decisions of the cabinet, as the line of conduct which was adopted and pursued by the opposition. With a frankness and promptitude which did them the utmost credit, the leaders, in both Houses, gave their warmest support to the measures which it became necessary to enforce against the outlawed rebel, Buonaparte.

One of the advantages obtained by Britain under the General Treaty, is the surrender of the Ionian islands, henceforth to form an independent state, under our immediate protection. In turning towards our distant possessions we have to record the satisfactory termination of a war in India, which, at one time, excited no ordinary degree of apprehension. Amongst what may be termed the domestic events of this year, the sudden and distressing close of Mr. Whitbread's life, by his own hand, stands prominent.* The escape of Lord Cochrane from the King's Bench prison, his recapture, and subsequent liberation, would scarcely be worth noticing, were it not for the remarkable circumstance, that, on the night when he made his appearance in the legislative assembly of the nation, after the payment of his fine, the motion for an additional grant to the Duke of Cumberland, on his marriage, was negatived by a single voice. Thus, had it not been for his Lordship's presence, the Speaker would have been situated in the awkward predicament of being called upon to give a casting vote, upon a question of much delicacy and interest.

A. D. 1816.] Parliament assembled this year on the 1st of February; when, in consequence of the indisposition of the Prince Regent, the Royal speech was read by the Lord Chancellor. His Royal Highness congratulated the two Houses upon the splendid and decisive successes obtained by his Majesty's arms, and those of his allies, by which he trusted that the lasting repose and security of Europe had been attained. His Royal Highness lamented the heavy pressure upon the country, which the late extraordinary exertions could not have failed to produce; but he assured them that they might rely on every disposition on his part, to concur in such measures of economy as might be found consistent with the security of the country, and with that station which it occupied in Europe. It was further stated in the Royal speech, that the hostilities in which we had been involved in the Island of Ceylon, and the continent of India, had been attended with decisive success; that those in Ceylon had terminated in an arrangement highly honourable to the British character, and which could not fail to augment the security and internal prosperity of that valuable possession; and that the operations in India had led to an armistice, which gave reason to hope that a peace had been concluded on terms advantageous to our interests in that part of the world.† In the House of Lords, an address, the echo of the speech, was agreed to nem. diss.; and, in the Commons, an amendment, moved by Mr. Brand, was negatived by 90, against 23, and the original address, moved

* This deplorable event occurred at Mr. Whitbread's own residence, Dover Street, Picadilly, on the 6th of July. Samuel Whitbread, Esq. M. P. born in 1758, was the only son of the late Samuel Whitbread, Esq. by lady Mary, third daughter of Charles, first Earl of Cornwallis. After passing through Eton and Oxford with distinguished credit, he made the tour of Europe under Mr. Coxe, celebrated for his publications on Switzerland, Russia, &c. He then stored his mind with that vast and comprehensive knowledge which he afterwards so usefully applied. He was distinguished for a firmness of mind, a purity of intention, a brilliancy of thought, and an energy of expression. From his entrance into public life, he warmly attached himself to the late Mr. Fox, and was his zealous supporter. His life may be said to be before his countrymen, for though they witnessed only his exertions in the senate, they must be well aware how many of his private hours had been consumed in informing himself upon every question of general policy, or private interest, that came before the house: for upon almost all these he was a constant speaker. He was the ready advocate of the aggrieved and persecuted of every nation, who thought proper to lay their complaints before the British Parliament; the active investigator of corruption, malversation, and neglect, in all public offices: so that the extent of his utility is to be contemplated not only with a view to the good he performed, but to the evil he prevented. His eloquence was bold, nervous, and decisive; pregnant with idea, it wasted nothing in expression; and disdained the weakness of verbiage when it bore the strength of argument. He was thought to be more powerful in attack than defence. He was the warm, liberal, and enthusiastic encourager of universal education, from the pure feeling of benevolence. In his friendship, no man was more ready to sacrifice time, care, and comfort, than himself. This was conspicuous in the arduous undertaking of the re-establishment of Drury Lane Theatre. His private life, however amiable, was merged in the superior importance of his public avocations. He was most faithful and zealous in the discharge of all the duties of domestic life. Mr. Whitbread married, June 1789, Lady Elizabeth Grey; eldest daughter of first Earl Grey; and Sir George Grey, her brother, married in 1795, Mary, sister of Mr. Whitbread. By Lady Elizabeth, Mr. Whitbread left issue two sons and two daughters Elizabeth: born December 21st, 1791; married to the brother of Earl Waldegrave: William, born January 4th, 1795; Samuel Charles, born February 16th, 1796; and Emma Louisa, born January 19th, 1798. Mr. Whitbread died possessed of five-eights of the brewery: his father making it compulsory on him, by a clause in his will, to retain a majority of shares in his own hands. He had completed his magnificent mansion, and nearly so his extensive plantations around it, at Southwell, the whole at an expenditure of not less than 120,000*l.* The evidence of Mr. Wilshire proved a variety of incidents relative to the deceased for several months, all of which went to establish a derangement of the mind of his lamented friend.—Mr. Holland, a magistrate of Epsom, corroborated the account of Mr. Wilshire. Mr. Whitbread's servant, and his private secretary were examined; and, after a moment's consideration, the Jury returned a verdict of insanity.

† In the month of August following, intelligence was received of the final ratification of the treaty of peace, with the Nepaul government in India, on the 4th of March, agreeably to the terms of the armistice. The Nepaulese, however, had violated the armistice; and, in the short campaign which consequently commenced in the latter end of February, some smart actions were fought: in the last of those, on the 2d or 3d of March, the enemy lost about 500 men: the British loss was comparatively small.

by

by Sir T. Ackland, and seconded by Mr. Methuen, was agreed to.* From an abstract of the net produce of the revenue, in the years ending the 5th of January, 1815, and the 5th of January 1816, it appeared that, in the former, it amounted to 65,429,981*l.* and in the latter to 66,443,802*l.* From the return of the following quarter, it subsequently appeared that the net revenue of the year ending on the 5th of April, 1815, was 65,806,470*l.*; and in the year ending on the 5th of April, 1816, 66,292,135*l*; making a difference of 485,665*l.* in favour of the latter. Notwithstanding this enormous produce, the Chancellor of the Exchequer acknowledged, on the very first day of the session, that it was the intention of his Majesty's ministers to propose a renewal of the Income Tax, at 5*l.* per cent, under the declared conviction that there was no mode of raising the necessary supplies less oppressive or so economical. In this intention, however, the accomplishment of which would have violated the pledge of Parliament, and the honour of government, the ministers were disappointed. The spirit of the people was perhaps never more nobly displayed, than in its firm and persevering opposition to this attempted breach of public faith. On the 5th of March, the subject having previously undergone much discussion—Mr. Vansittart, with the view of gaining over the poorer classes, of bribing one half of the community to sanction the plunder of the other—announced amongst his proposed modifications, that incomes of less than 150*l.* and farms of less rent than 150*l.* were to be exempt from the operation of the tax; and that, upon the farms of higher rent, the assessment was to be upon one third, instead of three fourths of the rent. Independently of the bad faith of the measure, a more feeble financial proposition was probably never made. On the reduced scale of 5*l.* per cent, Mr. Vansittart, in the first instance, estimated the tax to produce six millions annually. It had been proved, however, that, according to the original plan, more than half of the tax had been paid by incomes of 150*l.* a year, and under. Estimating the fair produce of the tax at ten per cent, at 12,000,000*l.* at five per cent the produce would, indeed, be 6,000,000*l.* but, by taking away, at one stroke, half of the sources of production—incomes of 150*l.* a year and under—the produce of the remaining half could be only 3,000,000*l.* and by the reduction of farm rents, &c. the actual produce would probably not have been more than 2,000,000*l.* On the final discussion of the subject, on the 18th of March, the motion for a continuance of the Income Tax was negatived by 238 against 201; giving a majority of 37 against ministers. This important triumph of justice was followed two days afterwards by the voluntary relinquishment, on the part of ministers, of the war tax on malt, which had been estimated to produce 2,000,000*l.* per annum. In consequence of the abolition of these taxes, ministers intimated their intention of proposing a loan. However, in bringing forward the budget, on the 27th of May, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the important and highly gratifying fact, that the surplus of the preceding year's grants in hand, amounted to no less a sum than 5,663,755*l.* Another circumstance of material importance was, that instead of some new and more oppressive impost than the Income Tax, with which the public had been threatened, the new duties—or rather modifications of duties—in the Customs and Excise, were so light, as scarcely to be felt by any class of the community.

Ministers, in their other favourite object of maintaining a very large standing army, were more successful; and, probably, the situation of the Continent might render it in some measure necessary. From time to time, however, reductions have been made in the military force of the country; and, agreeably to the system of economy to which the Prince Regent and his ministers pledged themselves, further reductions will take place.

Towards the close of the session, a bill was passed for a new silver coinage, of 35 millions of shillings and 35 millions of sixpences, to be put into circulation in the month of February, 1817.

The business of the session having been closed, Parliament was prorogued, by his Royal Highness the Prince Regent in person, on the 2d of July, to the 24th of August, and it has since been further prorogued to the 28th of January, 1817. In his speech at the close of the session, his Royal Highness gave assurances of the pacific and friendly disposition of the allies; thanked Parliament for the liberal supplies; expressed satisfaction at the arrangement made respecting the civil list, and for consolidating the revenues of Great Britain and Ireland; stated the happy result of the measures for suppressing the tumults which had recently taken place; and deeply lamented the continuance of pressure and distress, which he attributed to temporary causes, and which would be relieved by the progressive improvement of public credit.

The most important domestic event of the year 1816, was the marriage of her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte of Wales to his Serene Highness the Prince of Cobourg.† Previously to the union of the Royal pair, a grant of 60,000*l.* per annum was made to them, by Parliament, 10,000*l.* of which was for the privy purse of the Princess. The sum of 60,000*l.* was also voted, as an outfit; it being supposed that 40,000*l.* would be required for furnishing their residence, and purchasing plate and carriages; and 10,000*l.* for jewels for the Princess.‡

The marriage of the Princess Charlotte was followed

* Mr. Brand's amendment censured ministers for the length of the late prorogation, which had caused a delay in producing the respective treaties and conventions, and in the revisal of our civil and military establishments. Mr. Brougham expatiated on the distress of the country, which, he contended, was in a state of bankruptcy.—Lord Castlereagh admitted that the natural consequence of a sudden change from war to peace, must be distress, but that could only be considered as temporary. The external commerce of the country, it would appear, from a comparative statement of exports in the last nine months of the years 1814, and 1815, respectively, was in a flourishing condition; the exports in 1814, being 37,100,000*l.* and in 1815, 42,400,000*l.* leaving thus a balance in favour of the latter year of 5,300,,000*l.* As Parliament would exert itself in promoting a system of economy suitable to the times, he saw no room for dejection, complaint, or despondency.

† This event was announced in the London Gazette, under the date of Carlton House, Thursday, May 2d, 1816, as follows:—

"This evening, at nine o'clock, the solemnity of the marriage of her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte Augusta, daughter of his Royal Highness George Augusta Frederick, Prince of Wales, Regent of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with his Serene Highness Leopold George Frederick Duke of Saxe, Margrave of Meissen, Landgrave of Thuringuen, Prince of Cobourg of Saalfeld, was performed in the great crimson room at Carlton House by his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, in the presence of her Majesty the Queen, His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of York, Clarence, and Kent, their Royal Highnesses the Princesses Augusta, Sophia, Elizabeth and Mary, her Royal Highness the Duchess of York, her Highness the Princess Sophia of Gloucester, their Serene Highnesses the Duke and Mademoisselle D'Orleans, the Duke of Bourbon, the great officers of state, the ambassadors and ministers from foreign states, the officers of the household of her Majesty the Queen, of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, and of the younger branches of the royal family assisting at the ceremony. At the conclusion of the marriage service, the registry of the marriage was attested with the usual formalities, after which her Majesty the Queen, his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, the bride and bridegroom, with the rest of the royal family, retired to the royal closet. The bride and bridegroom soon after left Carlton House for Oatlands, the seat of his Royal Highness the Duke of York. Her Majesty the Queen, his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, and the rest of the royal family, passed into the great council chamber, where the great officers, the nobility, foreign ministers, and other persons of distinction present, paid their compliments on the occasion.

"Immediately after the conclusion of the marriage, the Park and Tower guns were fired, and the evening concluded with other public demonstrations of joy throughout the metropolis."

‡ German genealogists trace the origin of the present Saxon Princes to Witikind, the celebrated chief of the Saxons, who, for 30 years, contended against all the power of Charlemagne, and who, after his final submission to that conqueror, still retained large territorial possessions, together with the ducal title. From him were descended the Dukes of Saxony, of whom Bernard, in 1275, was the first that was raised to the electoral dignity. The electorate was enjoyed by the descendants of this Prince until 1422, when, on the failure of his line, it was conferred on Frederick, "the Warlike," Margrave of Thuringia, also a descendant of Witikind. The grandsons of this latter, were Ernest and Albert, from whom are descended the Ernestine and Albertine branches of the House of Saxony. The Ernestine, which was the elder branch, continued to enjoy the electorate until 1547, when John, "the Magnanimous," was deprived of that dignity by Charles V. who conferred it on Maurice the patriarch of the (July 22d) by that of her Royal Aunt, the Princess Mary, with the Duke of Gloucester. The personages present at the ceremony were, with very few exceptions, the same as at the marriage of the Princess Charlotte.*

In the summer and autumn of this year, an intended divorce between his Royal Highness the Prince Regent and his august consort, was publicly spoken of; and, as it was understood that the proceeding would give birth to a change of administration, a dissolution of Parliament was confidently anticipated. The report, however, gradually died away; the intention, if it ever existed, having probably been dropped, from respect for the feelings of the Princess Charlotte.—The Princess of Wales, having purchased a delightful seat on the banks of the Lake of Como, in Italy, fixed her residence there, for the winter of 1816. She had previously made a tour through several of the islands in the Mediterranean, Algiers, Constantinople, &c.

The revulsion occasioned by a sudden change from a state of war to a state of peace, combined with other causes, produced, in the early part of the year, a degree of agricultural and commercial distress, unparalleled, perhaps, in the annals of Britain, unless at the close of the American war. Distress naturally engenders discontent; and, at such seasons, mischievous characters are always ready to start forward, for their own purposes, to avail themselves of the irritated feelings of the people. In the counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and various other parts of the kingdom, tumults of a very serious nature took place. It was at Littleport, however, in the Isle of Ely, that the principal scene of destructive riot and plunder was displayed. About nine o'clock on the evening of the 22d of May, agreeably to a preconcerted plan, a desperate body of Fen men assembled; when a general and furious attack was made upon the premises of the Rev. Mr. Vachel, a magistrate for the Isle of Ely. The rioters commenced by breaking the windows of the house, which they then entered, demolished the furniture, burnt Mr. Vachel's papers and writings, and carried off all the family plate and trinkets of Mrs. Vachel. The damage here occasioned was estimated at 2,000*l*. The rioters then extorted considerable sums of money from the inhabitants of Littleport, and broke into two shops, helping themselves, without any one daring to oppose. The publicans' cellars were their next object, where, having drunk what they liked, they seized a waggon and team of horses, and proceeded to the town of Ely, taking with them every gun, and other deadly weapon, they could find. On their arrival at Ely, they were joined by some of its refractory inhabitants. Early the next morning, they demanded contributions from the houses and shops of the brewers, bakers, butchers, grocers, and millers, which were unavoidably assented to, and a dreadful scene of drunkenness and riotous conduct ensued. The tumult was at length subdued, on the third day, by the exertions of Sir Henry Bate Dudley, Bart. one of his Majesty's Justices of the peace for the Isle of Ely, aided by a number of the inhabitants of the place, a troop of volunteer cavalry, and a detachment of dragoons. The rioters had secreted themselves in different houses, and being armed with guns, they fired many shots at the military and civil powers, and severely wounded one of the soldiers. The military then received orders to fire, and the man who had wounded the soldier was instantly shot dead. The rioters were then completely disconcerted, and fled in exery direction; but, between 70 and 80 of them were taken prisoners and lodged in Ely goal. A special commission for the trial of these men was almost immediately ordered; and it is a remarkable circumstance, that every bill sent to the grand jury was returned true. The proceedings lasted from Monday June 17th to Saturday June the 22d. Fifty of the principal inhabitants of Ely regularly attended the Judges, as an escort, during their stay in the city; and, after the close of the trials, they accompanied them some distance on their return. Of 76 prisoners who were arraigned, 24 were capitally convicted, and five of them suffered the final execution of the law. Besides those who were reprieved, several were sentenced to different periods of transportation and imprisonment.

Later in the year, the inferior produce of the harvest, the consequent advance in the price of provisions, and the continued depression of trade and commerce, operated most severely upon the poorer classes throughout the kingdom. Numerous meetings were holden to consider of the means of alleviating the general distress: many noble subscriptions were raised, and many beneficial plans were adopted; but, at several of the assemblies ostensibly convened for the most benevolent purposes, persons of seditious principles came forward to inflame the minds of the people; to persuade them that their sufferings originated in the misconduct of their rulers; and that to obtain the abolition of places and pensions and a reform in Parliament, would prove a remedy for every evil. Of the meetings of this nature, those which were holden in Spa Fields are the most entitled to notice. On the 15th of November, agreeably to printed notices which had been profusedly circulated, many thousand artisans, manufacturers, and others, assembled, for the alledged purpose of presenting a petition to the Prince Regent and the Legislature, for relief under their distress. The hero of this meeting was a Mr. Hunt, who, after a long, violent, and inflammatory harangue, was drawn and accompanied by at least 3000 men, from the Spa Fields towards Fleet Street, and through the principal avenues at the west end of the town. Several regiments of cavalry from Hounslow and Romford had been stationed within a convenient distance from the place of meeting; and all the constables and peace officers, with the civil authorities, were in a state of readiness. In consequence of these precautions, no further ill consequences ensued than the demolition of some windows, the plunder of some bakers' shops, &c. Some of the rioters were apprehended and committed for trial; and one or two of them were afterwards capitally convicted at the Old Bailey.

the Albertine branch, to which the present king belongs. "The Protestant religion," says a learned writer of the present day, "has the greatest obligations to the Princes of the Ernestine line. Frederick, the eldest son of Ernest, was Luther's first patron and defender. John, the second son of Ernest, was the chief promoter of the protestation against the church of Rome, from which the Protestants have derived their appellation. "This John was surnamed "the Constant." He was the father of the above mentioned John "the Magnanimous," and grandfather of John Frederick, the founder of the house of Saxe Cobourg. Of this illustrious house the late head was the Duke of Saxe Cobourg, who commanded the allied armies at an early period of the French Revolution; and Prince Leopold, united to the Princess Charlotte, is the youngest son of that eminent commander.

* The year 1816 was unusually fruitful in marriages, amongst the royal families of Europe. The Emperor of Austria was married (the third time) to a Bavarian Princess; the King of Spain, to a daughter of the King of Portugal; the Prince Royal, son of the King of the Netherlands (who was to have married the Princess Charlotte of Wales) to a sister of the Emperor of Russia; and the Duc de Berri, nephew of the King of France, to a daughter of the late Queen of Sicily.

In the early part of the year, died the Queen of Portugal, who had long laboured under a melancholy mental derangement. She was born in 1746; and, dying, was succeeded by her son, John Maurice Joseph Lewis, Prince of Brazil, who had long governed the kingdom, as Regent. Her Majesty died at Brazil.

Frederick William Charles, the first King of Wirtemberg, died somewhat suddenly, on the 30th of October, of a disorder in the liver. This sovereign (born on the 7th of November, 1754) was a son of Duke Frederic Eugene, who, during the seven years war, distinguished himself in the Prussian service, while his brother, the reigning Duke Charles, led his troops, with great bitterness, against Frederick the Second. This son of Duke Eugene also, like others of his brothers, entered the Prussian service, which, however, he left in the life time of the Great Frederick, and went into that of Russia. He succeeded his father, who was only for a short time reigning Duke, on the 23d of December, 1797, as Duke of Wirtemberg, and his political relations became uncommonly difficult, in consequence of the war with France, and of the situation of his own territory. In 1803, he exchanged the ducal dignity for the electoral, and in 1805, (after the peace of Presburgh,) for the royal; and instead of the duchy, his paternal inheritance, of about two hundred square miles in extent, with five hundred and eighty-five thousand inhabitants, and a revenue of two millions of dollars, he left to his successor a kingdom, the smallest indeed in Europe, of 357 square miles in extent, a population of one million eight hundred thousand, and a revenue of eighteen millions of florins. By his first marriage with the Princess Augusta of Brunswick (sister of the Duke who fell last year) he left behind him three children; viz. the new king, William II. born in 1781, and married this year to the Grand Duchess Catherine, Duke Paul, and the wife of the Duke de Montfort (Jerome Buonaparte). His widow is the eldest sister of the Prince Regent of England.

It had been determined at the meeting, that Mr. Hunt, accompanied by Sir Francis Burdett, should present the petition to the Prince Regent, and that another meeting should be holden in the same place on Monday the 2d of December, to receive his Royal Highness's answer. Sir Francis Burdett not being in town, and not chusing to appear in the business, Mr. Hunt undertook the task of presenting the petition himself. On his application at Carlton House, he was informed, that he might either present the petition to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent at a levee, or place it in the hands of the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

In a correspondence which he held with Lord Sidmouth upon the subject, he was informed, that, except from the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the corporation of the city of London, his Royal Highness never received petitions, otherwise than in conformity to one of the two modes already mentioned. In consequence of this assurance, Mr. Hunt deposited the petition with Lord Sidmouth (the Home Secretary;) and on the 2d of December, as had been agreed upon, met an immense assembly of people, in Spa Fields, where he stated the details and the result of his applications and correspondence. Previously, however, to his arrival on the scene of action, a young man mounted a coal waggon, in which were about 20 persons, chiefly in the dress of sailors. Several flags, two of which were tri-coloured, bearing inflammatory inscriptions, were displayed. The young man already mentioned concluded a brief, but seditious harangue, by exclaiming, "there are 5,000 men in this place able and willing to follow me into the city, where we can teach them to relieve us." He then sprang from the waggon, and, followed by a considerable mob, proceeded towards the city. Many of this deluded rabble were armed with bludgeons, others had their pockets full of stones, and some it is said, were in possession of concealed daggers. In the bottom of the waggon was afterwards found a stocking containing a number of musket balls. On reaching Skinner Street, Snow-hill, one of the rioters advancing before the rest, entered the shop of Mr. Beckwith, a gunsmith, calling out arms, arms. Mr. Platt, a gentleman who happened to be in the shop, affably attempting to remonstrate, said, "my friend you are mistaken, this is not the place for arms," the ruffian instantly drew forth a pistol, fired, and lodged its contents in Mr. Platt's groin. He was secured, but, from inattention in the confusion, which ensued, he was rescued by the mob, who plundered the house and shop of a considerable quantity of guns, pistols, &c. The ruffians, thus armed, pursued their course through Cheapside towards the Royal Exchange, where they were met by the Lord Mayor (Wood), Alderman Sir James Shaw, and a strong party of the police. As soon as the greatest part of the rioters had passed the north gate of the Exchange, orders were given to close all the gates; by which means, three men, with arms, having on them the name of Beckwith, were taken into custody. Some others were also apprehended. Hearing the capture of their comrades and their banners, the insurgents on the outside became furious, and raising each other upon their shoulders, they fired over the tops of the gates at the Lord Mayor and his party, whilst others fired under them. A fresh force, however, arriving to his Lordship's aid, the ruffians departed, taking the direction of the Minories, where they entered the shops of Mr. Brander, and Mr. Ray, gun-smiths. There they obtained a considerable number of guns and pistols, and two small field-pieces, and plundered the proprietors of a considerable quantity of plate. At length, by the active exertions of the civil and military power, the rioters were dispersed, and the city was restored to its accustomed quiet.*

During the progress of the riots in the city, the proceedings in Spa Fields continued, but no attempt at riot was there made. A petition to Parliament, to be presented by Sir Francis Burdett and Lord Cochrane, was agreed to; the thanks of the meeting were voted to Mr. Hunt; and it was further resolved, that another meeting should take place in Spa Fields on the second Monday after the meeting of Parliament. Hunt, who may fairly be considered as the primary author of all the mischief in the city, rode from Spa Fields to a tavern in the metropolis, with an air of triumph, accompanied by an immense multitude of people. A portion of the mob from Spa Fields, paraded through different parts of the town, committing petty depredations throughout the afternoon and evening of the day.

Lord Cochrane, having been convicted, at the Surrey assizes (Aug. 17th) of having broken out of the King's Bench prison, was brought up for judgment on the 21st of November; when, after a long speech, in the delivery of which his Lordship was repeatedly checked for the introduction of irrelevant matter, he was sentenced to pay a fine of 100*l.* and to be imprisoned till the fine was paid. Refusing to submit to the pecuniary mulct, his Lordship was consigned to the apartments, in the King's Bench prison, from which he had formerly made his escape. At a meeting of his Lordship's friends, a few days afterwards, at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, it was somewhat ludicrously resolved, that a subscription, not exceeding one penny from each individual, should be entered into, towards paying the 100*l.* fine; that all the pence subscribed above 24,000 should be applied to the defraying of his Lordship's expences during the whole of the transactions; and that the fine of 100*l.* all in pence, should be carried to the proper officer appointed by government to receive the fine, surmounted by a bundle of sticks! His Lordship was liberated from prison on the 7th of December, his fine having been paid in the following manner:—85*l.* in bank-notes, 5*l.* in silver, and 10*l.* in copper.

In a political view, the year 1816 will be memorable, for the death of two of the most distinguished characters of the age—Mr. Sheridan,* and Earl Stanhope; the former

* It is important to mention, that, on the Monday night (the night of the meeting) one of the horse patrole on duty at highgate, perceiving three persons whom he suspected to belong to a gang of thieves, by which that neighbourhood had been some time infested, endeavoured to secure them. The patrole gave an alarm, and the watchmen on the spot attempted to secure the men; but one of them fired a pistol, another drew the trigger of a second pistol, which flashed in the pan, and the guardians of the night ran off in a panic! The patrole, however, succeeded in detaining one of the party, who proved to be a Mr. Watson, one of the orators of the former meeting in Spa Fields, and who had been many years known as a surgeon and apothecary, in reputable practice, in the neigbourhood of the Strand. He had also been at the meeting that morning. He had a horse pistol in his pocket, heavily loaded; in addition to which he was armed with a stick, containing a tuck, or dirk. With the latter he wounded two men, who volunteered their services in guarding him, whilst the patrole went in pursuit (though without effect) of his companions. Watson acknowledged the existence of a plot, and expressed his regret that the conspirators (at the head of whom was his son) had been too precipitate. Young Watson, it appears, was the man who harangued the mob from the coal waggon, then jumped down, and headed them in their depredations. Various circumstances also very forcibly concur to point him out as the person who shot Mr. Platt, in Mr. Beckwith's shop. The senior Watson had several papers about him, relating to the Spa Fields meeting. He was committed for trial, January 2, 1817, for cutting and maiming the two men who assisted in his apprehension. Preston, the secretary of the society, apparently a political enthusiast, with several of the other rioters, was admitted to bail, for a misdemeanour. Two of them were committed for trial, under the charge of felony, in breaking and plundering the house of Mr. Beckwith.

* The Right Honourable Richard Brinsley Sheridan, who died in his 65th, or according to some, in his 68th year, was the last of that great constellation of talents, by which this country was adorned in the period between 1770 and 1810, a period unexampled in British history for senatorial eloquence. Mr. Sheridan was one of the most brilliant luminaries of that period, and, though he shone with great lustre in Parliament, his eloquence was surpassed by the brilliancy of his talents as a comic poet. From his Rivals, in 1775, to his Critic, no writer has ever approached his excellence. Mr. Sheridan has left the following works:—The Rivals, a Comedy; St. Patrick's Day, a Farce; The Duenna, a Comic Opera; The School for Scandal, a Comedy; A Trip to Scarborough, altered from Vaubrugh; The Tempest, altered 1777; The Critic, or a Tragedy rehearsed, 1781. The Camp is attributed to Mr. Sheridan's pen; but it is positively denied, by Mr. Tate Wilkinson, that Mr. S. was its author. The drama of Pizarro received considerable improvements from Mr. Sheridan's pen. The disease that terminated Mr. Sheridan's life, was in the stomach, and it had been gradually aggravating for some time back, until at length this essential organ became quite incapable of performing its functions. For four or five months before, he was confined to his bed, or at least very rarely sat up. When he was unable to take former of whom departed on the 7th of July, the latter on the 15th of December.*

We have now arrived at that period of our history, that we have only one more transaction of leading importance to relate; and the affair to which we allude reflects so much honour on the moral character, and martial prowess of Britain, that we could not desire a more brilliant close of this eventful period. For a series of years, the pirates, on the coast of Barbary, had committed great depredations on almost every power in Europe. Their unchecked career of success rendered them so insolent, that they at last attacked the English flag. Sir Thomas Maitland, the Governor of Malta, proceeded to Tripoli, the government of which acceded to all that he proposed; and, at Tunis, every thing was amicably settled by negociation. Presents were interchanged, and no further hostilities were contemplated. These arrangements, however, proving ineffectual, Admiral Lord Exmouth, with a portion of the Mediterranean fleet, proceeded in the early part of the present year, first to Tunis, and then to Tripoli. At both these places, the Deys appeared fully disposed to accede to any terms that his Lordship should offer in the name of the Prince Regent. Lord Exmouth accordingly proposed, at each of the places mentioned, that a treaty should be signed, for ever prohibiting the making of Christian slaves; such prisoners as might be taken in war, only to be considered as prisoners of war. The Deys readily agreed, and treaties were signed. The fleet then returned to Algiers, for the purpose, as was understood, of obtaining a revision of the treaty which the Dey had made with America, respecting the sale of prizes in his ports. The Dey replied to this question, that the treaty he had recently made with that nation, was at an end; that if they chose not to abide by the old one, he would agree to no other. Lord Exmouth then proposed to the Dey, a treaty similar to that made at Tunis and Tripoli, for doing away with slavery altogether. The Dey made a firm and resolute stand at this proposal. He represented, that it was impossible to entirely abolish the system that had so long subsisted—that it was the commerce of the country, and that a change which would be so detrimental to the interests of every Turk and Moor, it would require considerable time to bring their minds to submit to. The divan, and the military, (Turks,) he was persuaded, would never renounce the trade. Lord Exmouth having urged his demands, with all his wonted energy and perseverance, in vain, departed from the interview with a determination to commence hostilities. The Dey, therefore, ordered the British Consul, Mr. M'Donald, to be confined, and all the English vessels at Oran, to be seized. The next day, the squadron was got under weigh, for the purpose of going into the Mole, to destroy the Algerine naval force; but a violent gale came on, which continued until four o'clock in the afternoon, and then it would have been too late to take a favourable position alongside the batteries. The ships anchored again. His Lordship then dispatched a letter to the Dey, demanding that the Consul should be released, and sent off to the fleet. The Dey refused to give him up, saying he owed him 500,000 dollars; when that sum was paid, he should depart. The Dey, when he parted from Lord Exmouth, said, though he should be prepared for hostilities, he would not fire the first shot. Upon the whole, as far as the question bore upon his feelings and interests, he appeared disposed to do away with slavery. The next day, the Dey sent off to Lord Exmouth, a proposal, that he was willing to conclude a perpetual peace with the kingdom of Hanover: but that part of the negociation which referred to the abolition of slavery, should stand over for six months, that he might be enabled to obtain the advice and sanction of the Grand Seignior upon the question. To this Lord Exmouth agreed, excepting that the time of suspension should be three, instead of six months. This being mutually decided, the Tagus frigate, Captain Deans Dundas, was appointed to take the Dey's ambassador to Constantinople. The use of that ship had, at the first visit, been granted to the Dey, to convey his presents to the Grand Seignior, as he had not sent any since he was chosen to the regency. Lord Exmouth then exchanged the usual civilities with the Dey, and departed with his fleet for England, leaving the Tagus for the service appointed.

Scarcely, however, had Lord Exmouth reached England, when intelligence arrived of a new and horrible outrage having been perpetrated by the barbarians. About the 27th of May, between 3 and 400 Corsican, Neapolitan, and Sicilian fishing boats, employed in the coral fishery, being on shore, near the town and castle in the vicinity of Tunis, their usual rendezvous, they were attacked by an Algerine frigate, which debarked a great number of men, and fired upon them. The fortress of Bona followed the example of the frigate, and fired upon them also. At the same time, a corps of cavalry, from Bona, came down upon them, charged them furiously, killed a great number of the people, and forced the rest to their boats by swimming. The slaughter amongst these poor defenceless creatures, was dreadful.

Finding it impracticable to bind the barbarians by friendly treaties, it was at length resolved to take severe vengeance for their cruelty and perfidy. Lord Exmouth was accordingly appointed to the command of a squadron destined to this important service. His Lordship accordingly sailed from Plymouth, on the 28th of July, in the Queen Charlotte, of 100 guns, with a commensurate force of ships of the line, frigates, sloops, bombs, &c. Having obtained a reinforcement at Gibraltar, Lord Exmouth (joined by a Dutch squadron,) sailed about the 14th of August, direct for Algiers.

The Algerines, it appears, had, ever since the 23d of take any food, the sensorium became affected, and delirium was the consequence. This delirium, however, subsided for some days before his demise. Mr. Sheridan's strength was quite exhausted for some time previously to his decease, and he may be said to have slumbered into death, for not the least convulsive movement accompanied his dissolution. "To Mr. Sheridan," it has been observed, "belonged every kind of intellectual excellence, omne genus tetigit—nullum tetigit quod non ornavit. As a dramatic writer, 40 years have nearly elapsed, since The School for Scandal was brought out, and yet what writer has produced any comedy to be put into competition with it? Who has equalled the Critic? As a poet, who has surpassed the monody on the death of Garrick? As an orator, with the exception of Pitt and Burke, who excelled him? He had strength without coarseness—liveliness without frivolity—he was bold, but dexterous in his attacks—not easily repulsed, but when repelled, effecting his retreat in good order—often severe—much oftener witty, gay, and graceful—disentangling what was confused—enlivening what was dull—very clear in his arrangement—very comprehensive in his views,—flashing upon his hearers with a burst of brilliancy! When no other speaker was listened to, he could arrest, and chain down the members to their seats—all hanging upon him with the most eager attention—all fixed in wonder and delight;—he never tired—he could adapt himself, more than any other man, to all minds and to all capacities—'from grave to gay, from lively to severe.' Every quality of an orator was united in him—the mind—the eye—quick, sparkling, penetrating, matchless almost for brilliancy and expression—the gesture, the voice. Mr. Pitt had more dignity, more copiousness, more grasp, more sarcasm. But in richness of imagery he was inferior to Sheridan, who had no superior but Burke. He was less powerful and commanding in argument, than Mr. Fox; but this was the only advantage Mr. Fox had over him. As an orator, we should place him after Pitt and Burke."

* Lord Stanhope's whole life had been dedicated to the improvement of mathematical, legal, and political science. His plain, unaffected, and amiable manners, conciliated as much affection as his extensive knowledge, and unimpeachable integrity commanded respect from all who knew or observed him. His loss will, on many accounts, make a chasm in public life, which will not be easily supplied. The great and useful work for which he was peculiarly qualified, and to which he had, for a long time, applied the most earnest attention, will, it is feared, now fall to the ground; we allude to a digest of all the statutes, a work of such stupendous labour, as well as information, that few persons can be expected to set about it with vigour, unless like Lord Stanhope, they had acquired a sort of parental fondness for the subject, by brooding over it for years. His Lordship was born, August 3d, 1753; succeeded his father, Philip, the late Earl, March 7th, 1786; and married, in December, 1774, Hester Pitt, eldest daughter of William Pitt, first Earl of Chatham, sister of the present Earl, and of the late Right Honourable William Pitt, by whom he had issue, Hester Lucy Griselda, married to John Tickell, Esq. of Hambledon, Hants; and Lucy Rachael, married to Thomas Taylor, Esq. of Seven Oaks, Kent; since dead. His Lordship married, secondly, in 1791, Louisa, only daughter of Henry Grenville, Esq. late Governor of Barbadoes, and uncle to George, first Marquis of Buckingham, by whom he had issue, Philip Henry, Viscount Mahon, now Earl of Stanhope, and two other sons.

May, been preparing for the expected attack of our fleet, by removing every article of value from the town. The town of Algiers was well defended by about 1000 pieces of ordnance, of every calibre, 300 of which were of brass. The town, rising abruptly from the water's edge, to a great height, was surrounded by a high wall, the southern side of which was adorned with mens' heads. The batteries were one above another, strongly constructed and fortified. Sweeping from the western extremity is a tongue of land, which defends the entrance into the inner part of the harbour, and also the approach to it. Along the whole of this tongue was a range of strong batteries, which our ships were obliged to pass, to take their station near the town, for the purpose of bombarding it. Lord Exmouth arrived on the 27th of August. "The Prometheus," observes his Lordship, "was dispatched to Algiers, some time before, to endeavour to get away the Consul; Captain Dashwood had, with difficulty, succeeded in bringing away, disguised in midshipman's uniform, his wife and daughter, leaving a boat to bring off their infant child. Coming down in a basket, with the surgeon, who thought he had composed it, it unhappily cried in the gateway, and, in consequence, the surgeon, and three midshipmen, in all 18 persons, were seized, and confined as slaves, in the usual dungeons. The child was sent off, next morning, by the Dey; and, as a solitary instance of his humanity, it ought to be recorded by me. The ships were all in port, and between 40 and 50 gun and mortar boats ready in forward repair." All proposals for conciliation having proved ineffectual, and every arrangement having been made for the attack, our fleet passed along the line of batteries already mentioned. The Impregnable, from getting closer, was exposed, not only to the fire of the batteries immediately opposite, but to other batteries rising behind and above them. At a distance behind the Impregnable, but parallel with the tongue of land, were our mortar and rocket boats, which were enabled to throw rockets not only against the batteries immediately in front, but over them to the batteries in the rear. As we ranged along the line, to take our station, the enemy did not fire; either not thinking that we should venture so near the city, or wishing to get us as close as possible to render their fire more destructive. The Queen Charlotte took her station off the extreme point of the tongue, by which she enfiladed the whole line of batteries along it. So near was she, that every part of the mole, and what was called the marine, was visible from our quarter-deck. Both were crowded with spectators, about 2 or 3000, who remained gazing at us, and seemed not at all to expect that we were about to fire. Lord Exmouth stood upon the poop, and waved his hat to them to retire, and signified that he was about to begin hostilities. They did not attend to his humane warning, and the consequence was, that our first broadside swept off from 500 to 1000 of them. The most advanced of the Algerine navy was a brig, to which the Queen Charlotte lashed herself; closer in with the shore, in the bosom of the harbour, were two Algerine frigates, and the rest of the Algerine navy behind them. The fury and tremendous nature of the bombardment will never be forgotten.* It continued, with little intermission, from

"As the ships were becalmed, I embraced this opportunity of dispatching a boat, under cover of the Severn, with a flag of truce, and the demands I had to make, in the name of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, on the Dey of Algiers, directing the officer to wait two or three hours for the Dey's answer, at which time, if no reply was sent, he was to return to the flag-ship; he was met near the mole, by the captain of the port, who on being told the answer was expected in one hour, replied, that it was impossible. The officer then said, he would wait two or three hours; he then observed two hours was quite sufficient. The fleet, at this time, by the springing up of the sea breeze, had reached the bay, and were preparing the boats and flotilla for service, until near two o'clock, when, observing that my officer was returning, with the signal flying, that no answer had been received, after a delay of upwards of three hours, I instantly made the signal to know if the ships were all ready, which being answered in the affirmative, the Queen Charlotte bore up, followed by the rest of the fleet, for their appointed stations; the flag, leading in the prescribed order, was anchored in the entrance of the Mole, at about 50 yards distance. At this moment, not a gun had been fired, and I began to suspect a full compliance with the terms which had been so many hours in their hands; at this period of profound silence, a shot was fired at us from the mole, and two of the ships to the northward then following; this was promptly returned by the Queen Charlotte, who was then lashing to the main-mast of a brig, fast to the shore, in the mouth of the Mole, and which we had steered for, as the guide to our position. Thus commenced a fire as animated and well supported, as I believe, was ever witnessed, from a quarter before three until nine, without intermission, and which did not cease altogether till half-past eleven. The ships immediately following me, were admirably and coolly taking their stations, with a precision even beyond my most sanguine hope, and never did the British flag receive, on any occasion, more zealous and honourable support. To look further on the line than immediately round me, was perfectly impossible..... I had about this time, the satisfaction of seeing Vice-Admiral Van Capellen's flag in the station I had assigned to him; and soon after, at intervals, the remainder of his frigates, keeping up a well-supported fire on the flanking batteries he had offered to cover us from, as it had not been in my power for want of room, to bring him in the front of the Mole. About sunset, I received a message from Rear-Admiral Milne, conveying to me the severe loss the Impregnable was sustaining, having then 150 killed and wounded, and requesting I would send him a frigate to divert some of the fire he was under. I had, at this time, sent orders to the explosion vessel under the charge of Lieutenant Fleming and Mr. Parker, by Captain Reade, of the engineers, to bring her into the Mole; but the Rear-Admiral thinking she would do him an essential service if exploded under the battery in his front, I sent orders to this vessel to that effect, which were executed. I desired also the Rear-Admiral might be informed, that many of the ships being now in flames, and certain of the destruction of the whole, I considered I had executed the most important part of my instructions, and should make every preparation for withdrawing the ships, and desired he would do so as soon as possible with his division.

"There were awful moments during the conflict, which I cannot now attempt to describe, occasioned by firing the ships so near us, and I had long resisted the eager intreaties of several around me, to make the attempt upon the outer frigate, distant about 100 yards, which at length I gave into, and Major Gossett by my side, who had been eager to land his corps of miners, pressed me most anxiously for permission to accompany Lieutenant Richards, in this ship's barge. The frigate was instantly boarded, and in ten minutes in a perfect blaze. The enemy's batteries around my division, were about ten o'clock silenced, and in a state of perfect ruin and dilapidation; and the fire was reserved as much as possible, to save powder, and reply to a few guns now and then bearing upon us, although a fort on the upper angle of the city, on which our guns could not be brought to bear, continued to annoy the ships by shot and shells during the whole time. Providence, at this interval, gave to my anxious wishes the usual land wind, common in this bay, and my expectations were completed.—We were all hands employed warping and towing off, and by the help of the light air, the whole were under sail, and came to anchor out of reach of shells about two in the morning, after twelve hours incessant labour. The flotilla of mortar, gun, and rocket-boats, under the direction of their respective artillery officers, shared, to the full extent of their power, in the honours of this day, and performed good service; it was by their fire, all the ships in the port, with the exception of the outer frigate, were in flames, which extended rapidly over the whole arsenal, store-houses, and gun-boats, exhibiting a spectacle of awful grandeur and interest, which no pen can describe. The sloops of war, which had been appropriated to aid and assist the ships of the line, and prepare for their retreat, performed not only that duty well, but embraced every opportunity of firing through the intervals, and were constantly in motion. The shells from the bombs were admirably well thrown by the royal marine artillery, and though thrown directly across and over us, not an accident that I know of, occurred to any ship. The whole was conducted in perfect silence, and such a thing as a cheer I never heard in any part of the line, and that the guns were well worked and directed, will be seen for many years to come, and remembered by these barbarians for ever. Not an officer or man confined his exertions within the precise limits of his own duty; all were eager to attempt services which I found more difficult to restrain than excite. The Algerines' loss was between 6 and 7000 men.

"Abstract of the Killed and Wounded;

"Total, 15 officers, 88 seamen, 19 marine, 1 marine artillery, 1 rocket-troop, 4 boys, killed; 59 officers, 459 seamen, 106 marines, 5 marine artillery, 14 sappers and miners, 4 rocket-troop, 31 boys, 12 supernumaries, wounded. Total British killed and wounded, 128 killed, 690 wounded. Dutch squadron, 13 killed, 53 wounded.—Grand total, 883.

Memorandum of the destruction in the Mole of Algiers, in the attack of the 27th of August, 1816.

"Four large frigates of 44 guns; 5 large corvettes, from 24 to 30; all the gun and mortar-boats, except 7; 30 destroyed; several merchant brigs and schooners; a great number of small vessels of various descriptions; all the pontoons, lighters, &c, store-houses and arsenal, with all the timber, and various marine articles, destroyed in part, a great many gun-carriages, mortar beds, casks, and ships stores of all descriptions.

"EXMOUTH."

nearly three till nearly eleven; the Algerines fighting all the time with the utmost fury and desperation; but yet with great skill and effect. About ten, it was deemed advisable to take a larger offing during the night. It was extremely dark indeed; but the darkness was illuminated by a violent storm of lightning, with thunder, which came on suddenly, and by the incessant fire of the batteries. During the action, Lord Exmouth received two wounds, one in the cheek, and another in the thigh, but happily neither of them of a severe nature. The result of this splendid achievement was, that the Dey submitted to the final abolition of Christian slavery; to deliver up all the slaves in his dominions, to whatever nation they might belong; to return all the money that he had received, for the redemption of slaves, from the commencement of the year 1816; and to make reparation, and a public apology, to the British Consul, for the wrongs and indignities to which he had been subjected.*

Our gallant squadron returned from Algiers, with the proud consciousness, that every man had done his duty. For his services on this occasion, Lord Exmouth was raised from the dignity of Baron, to that of Viscount; and a considerable promotion took place amongst the officers who had so nobly participated in the chastisement of an unprincipled tyrant.

* The Dey, in presence of his divan, apologised to the British Consul, for the personal restraint which had been imposed upon him, during the late transaction; and, he also paid to the Consul, a sum of 3000 dollars, as a remuneration for depredations committed on his residence after his imprisonment. After the treaties had been negociated, and the Dey had refunded 382,500 dollars, which he had lately received from the governments of Naples and Sardinia, and had released 1083 Christian slaves who were at Algiers, it came to the knowledge of Lord Exmouth, that two Spaniards, the one a merchant, and the other the Vice-Consul of that nation, had not been released, but were still held by the Dey, in very severe custody, on pretence that they were prisoners for debt. His Lordship had determined to insist on the unconditional release of the two Spaniards. He therefore desired an answer, yes or no; and, in the event of the latter, stated, that he would immediately recommence hostilities, and his Lordship commenced preparations for that purpose. These measures had the desired effect; and the two persons were released from a long and severe captivity, so that no Christian prisoner remained at Algiers!

ADDENDA.

TO preserve, unbroken, the interest excited by the momentous affairs of Europe, during the latter years of a war, the most extraordinary in its origin, its progress, and its close, it was found desirable to pass more rapidly over the events of the opposite hemisphere. At any other period, a contest between Britain and America, would have formed a primary object of attraction to the historical reader: now, therefore, having traced the great European conflict to a long-wished-for and honourable termination, it becomes our task to exhibit, somewhat more in detail, the leading scenes of the transatlantic drama.

In the year 1812, when America ventured to declare war against the most powerful maritime state in the world, her own navy, if navy it could be called, did not include a single line of battle ship, and the utter annihilation of her frigates, and smaller vessels, was, in this country, most confidently predicted. The military force of the United States, though numerically formidable, was principally of an irregular kind, without discipline, unaccustomed to the hardships of war, and destitute of that patient endurance, and subordinate spirit, without which armies, however strong, are always liable to become the mutinous depositories of panic.*

A war so differently affecting the different parts of the Union, could not fail to call forth those violent political contentions for which that republic is so much distinguished. At Boston, the declaration of war was made the signal of a general mourning; all the ships in the harbour displayed flags half-mast high; and in that, as in other cities of the northern states, public meetings of the inhabitants were held, at which a number of resolutions were passed, stigmatising the approaching contest as unnecessary and ruinous, and as tending to a connection with France, destructive to American liberty, and independence. Immediately after the declaration of war, a party was formed, called the "peace party," which combined nearly the whole of the federalists throughout the United States, and by whom a steady, systematic, and energetic opposition, principally directed against the national finances, was maintained to the latest period of the war. With the democratic party, and in the southern states in particular, where swarms of privateers were preparing to reap a rich harvest among the West India islands, the popular sentiment was decidedly in favour of war; and, of all the cities of America, in this interest, Baltimore perhaps stood in the first rank in zeal and in violence.

Early in the year, a body of militia, amounting to 2500 men, had been placed under the command of General Hull; and, on the 12th of July, the American army crossed the river Detroit, and erected the standard of the United States, in Upper Canada. The General of the invading army, on his arrival at Sandwich issued a proclamation to the British colonists, inviting the militia to return to their homes, and promising to the peaceable inhabitants the "blessing of peace, liberty, and security." This proclamation, which expressed the utmost confidence of success, threatened a war of extermination, in case of the employment of the Indian tribes, which appear to have been the objects of General Hull's peculiar dread and apprehension. The Indians were, however, already engaged in hostilities with the subjects of the United States; and, on the 17th of July, intelligence was received of the capture of fort Michilimachinack, the most northern military post in the United States, by a combined operation of the British, the Canadians, and the savages. After passing the line of demarkation, by which the British settlements, in North America, are separated from the territory of the United States, General Hull advanced against fort Amhersburg, or

* On the 11th of January, 1812, an act was passed for raising ten regiments of infantry, two regiments of artillery, and one regiment of light dragoons, to be enlisted for five years; the infantry to amount to 20,000; the artillery, to 4000; and the cavalry, to 1000 men. On the 6th of the month, an act, authorising the President of the United States, to accept the service of certain volunteer corps, not exceeding 50,000, passed into a law; and, by an act of congress, passed the 10th of April, detachments from the militia, to the amount of 100,000, were voted in regular proportions. The regular army of the United States, upon the declaration of war, consisting of eleven regiments of the old peace establishment, estimated at 500 men each.

Malden, the garrison of which consisted of about 600 men, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel St. George. Here the American General received his first check, and was three times repulsed in his attempt to cross the Canard river. General Sir George Prevost, the British Governor-in-Chief, had made all the arrangements in his power, for the defence of Upper Canada, and the command of the force destined for this purpose, consisting of 30 royal artillery men, 250 regular troops, of the 41st regiment, 400 Canadian militia, and 600 Indians, was conferred on Major-General Brock. It might have been supposed, that such a force would prove totally inadequate to meet the American army; but the defective composition of the enemy's troops, and the want of energy and skill in their commander, soon displayed themselves in a manner that portended their final overthrow. Ignorant of the situation and movements of the British force which was coming to relieve the fort to which he had laid siege, and continually harassed and bewildered with various and contradictory reports concerning the different tribes of the hostile Indians, indecision and distrust began to prevail in the camp, the plan of attacking Amhersburg was abandoned, and on the 8th of August, the Americans retreated to Detroit, the capital of the Michigan territory, without even the appearance of an enemy to pursue them. On the arrival of Major-General Brock at Amhersburg, on the 13th, he found that Lieut.-Col. Proctor had begun to erect batteries opposite fort Detroit; and, although opposed by a well-directed fire from seven twenty-four pounders, the works were continued without intermission. The force at the disposal of the British General, being all collected in the neighbourhood of Sandwich, they passed the river in the course of the 15th, without molestation, and advanced on the following morning to Spring Well, an advantageous position, three miles west of Detroit. The Indians, who had, in the meantime, effected their landing two miles below, moved forwards, and occupied the woods, about a mile and a half to the west of the British position. Having learned, that General Hull had dispatched Colonel M'Arthur, one of his best officers, with a detachment of 500 men, to escort a supply of provisions from the river Raisin, General Brock decided on an immediate attack, and advanced with a resolution to carry Detroit on the land side, while the Indians penetrated the camp. When the head of the British column had arrived within about 500 yards of the American lines, orders were given by General Hull, for the whole of his troops to retreat to the fort, and for the artillery not to open on the assailants. A white flag, hung from the walls, indicated the wish of the American General to capitulate, and the terms were soon agreed upon. By this capitulation, so glorious to the arms of Britain, and so disgraceful to the American army, 2500 men became prisoners of war, and 33 pieces of brass and iron ordnance, fell into their hands..

General Hull, when his conduct came to be investigated before a court-martial, was found guilty of neglect of duty, unofficer-like conduct, and adjudged to be shot; but, in consideration of "his revolutionary services, and his advanced age," the court recommended him to mercy; and the President, while he expressed his approbation of the sentence, thought proper to remit its execution.

The season was far advanced before the Americans could collect a sufficient force upon the Niagara frontier, to attempt offensive operations; but, in October, General Van Ranssellaer, of the New York militia, fixed his head-quarters at Lewestown, between the Lakes Ontario and Erie, with a force under his command, amounting to about 4000 men, of which 1500 were regular troops, and the remainder the militia contingents of the neighbouring states. Early on the morning of the 13th, a division of the enemy's troops, under General Wadsworth, embarked near the falls of Niagara, and made an attack upon the British position of Queenstown. Although the day had not yet dawned, this post was defended with great gallantry, by the two flank companies of the 49th regiment, animated by the presence of their gallant chief, Major-General Brock, whose valuable life was, on this occasion, devoted to his country's service. The British position fell, with their lamented General; but, reinforcements of regular troops, militia, and Indians, having been sent up from Fort George, under the direction of Major-General Sheaffe, who now assumed the command of the army, a movement was made on the enemy's left, while a body of artillery, under the able direction of Captain Holcroft, supported by a body of infantry, engaged him in front. This operation was further aided by the judicious position which Norton, the Indian chief, had taken on the woody high ground, above Queenstown. A communication being thus opened with Chippaway, a junction was formed with farther succours which had been ordered from that station. The crisis of the battle was now approaching, and a powerful reinforcement dispatched to the aid of General Wadsworth, from the American side of the river, might have secured the victory; but, to the utter astonishment of the Commander-in-Chief, he found that the ardour of the "unengaged troops" had entirely subsided; and, all his solicitations, though seconded by the efforts of Lieutenant-Colonel Bloom, and Mr. Justice Peck, could not prevail upon his insubordinate levies to embark to the assistance of their companions in arms. At three o'clock, in the afternoon, a vigorous attack was made upon the enemy's lines; and, after a short, but animated conflict, victory again ranged herself under the British banners. The surrender of General Wadsworth, with a force of 900 men, to an army inferior in numbers, is the best eulogium that can be pronounced upon the plan of attack adopted by Major-General Sheaffe, and upon the zeal and undaunted gallantry that animated every officer and soldier in his army. The loss of the British army, did not exceed 100 men, in killed, wounded, and missing; while the loss of the Americans, including deserters, was estimated at 2000.

The British and American seamen, at length, had an opportunity of displaying their skill and bravery. The ships which met on the 19th of August, off the coast of Labrador, were the Guerriere, Captain Dacres; and the Constitution, Captain Hull; the former rated at 38 guns, but mounted 49; and the latter rated at 44 guns, but mounted 56. At two o'clock in the afternoon, the Constitution bore down upon the Guerriere; and, at five, the frigates came to close action. After an exchange of broadsides, the Constitution placed herself within pistol-shot of her antagonist, when Captain Hull ordered a brisk fire to commence from all her guns, which were double-shotted, and so well directed, that in fifteen minutes, the mizen-mast of the Guerriere went by the board. The enemy then placed herself in a situation to rake the British frigate, and his grape-shot and riflemen swept the deck. Captain Dacres, perceiving his perilous situation, endeavoured to clear himself of his opponent; and, with this view, the marines and boarders were ordered from the main-deck: but, no sooner were these orders given, than the Captain received a violent contusion in his back, and Mr. Grant, who commanded the forecastle, was carried below, severely wounded. The battle had now raged nearly two hours, and the fore and main-masts of the Guerriere, were shot away, and the vessel, thus dismantled, was reduced to an unmanageable hulk. The wreck was no sooner cleared, than the sprit-sail gave way; and the ship rolled so deep in the sea, that her main-deck guns were under water. It now became obvious, that all further resistance must prove unavailing; and Captain Dacres, after a short consultation with his few remaining officers, determined to spare the lives of his valuable crew, by hauling down his colours, which necessity had obliged him to lash to the stump of the mizen-mast. The hull of the Guerriere was so much shattered, that a few more broadsides would have sent her to the bottom. Fifteen of her crew were killed, and 63 wounded; among the former of whom, was Lieutenant Read; and, among the latter, ter, all the principal officers in the ship. The loss of the Constitution amounted only to seven killed, and seven wounded. It was soon discovered, that the Guerriere was so much injured, that all attempts to tow her into port would be unavailing; and Captain Hull, having previously ordered all the prisoners to be brought on board his own ship, consigned his prize to the flames. The Captain and the crew of the Constitution, when they landed at Boston, were received by their fellow-citizens with every mark of honour and distinction; a splendid entertainment was given to Captain Hull, and his officers; and in all the principal towns through which he passed, after his return, the war became more popular, and the spirit of marine enterprise more animated and enthusiastic. In England, the capture of the Guerriere created astonishment, not unmixed with dismay. The Constitution, however, was the superior of the Guerriere, in every respect; she was a larger vessel; better prepared both for sailing and for action; her guns were more numerous, in the proportion of 56 to 49; her weight of metal gave her a still further advantage; and, while her number of men amounted to 476, the Guerriere, on coming into action, could only muster at quarters 244 men and 19 boys.*

In the interval between the breaking out of the war, and the close of the year 1812, the elections took place, and the federalist party, in common with the English people, cherished the expectation that the power and influence of Mr. Madison, and the war party in America, were nearly at an end. The disasters in Canada, however, instead of rendering the war more generally and decidedly unpopular, changed the dislike which had been entertained for it in the northern states, into a determination to prosecute the contest with increased vigour. The democratic interest was consequently strengthened; and, on the 2d of December, the re-election of Mr. Madison was secured. Soon after the American government had declared war against Great Britain, overtures of a pacific nature were made by both parties; but, although much diplomatic discussion took place, on both sides of the water, the negociation proved unsuccessful. In each of the hostile countries, the original cause of the war, and the responsibility of its continuance, were imputed to the enemy. When the angry passions, however, in which

* Success continued to preponderate on the side of the Americans, and the fate of the Guerriere proved, unfortunately, not a solitary case. Besides the numerous captures made by their privateers, actions took place between ships of war, which tended to augment the confidence already inspired by the success of their maritime tactics. On the 18th of October, his Majesty's armed brig, the Frolic, Captain Whinyates, convoying six valuable merchant ships from Honduras to England, while in the act of repairing damages to her masts and sails, received in a violent gale on the preceding night, descried an American brig, which gave chase to the convoy. At eleven o'clock in the forenoon, this vessel, which proved to be the Wasp, Captain Jacob Jones, bore down upon the Frolic, and the two brigs came to close action off the island of Bermuda. The superior fire of the British guns gave every reason to suppose that the contest would speedily terminate in their favour. This expectation was favoured by the main-top-mast of the Wasp being shot away in a few minutes after the battle commenced, and falling with the main-top-sail-yard across the fore-top-sail braces, her head became unmanageable during the rest of the action. To counteract the effects of this disaster, the Americans shot a-head of the Frolic, raked her, and then resumed their position on the larboard bow. The fire of the Wasp was now evidently attended with great success, and the braces of the Frolic being shot away, she became unmanageable. After lying some time exposed to a most destructive fire, which she was unable to return, the enemy boarded, and hauled down the British ensign in 43 minutes after the discharge of the first shot. On passing from the bowsprit to the forecastle, the Americans were surprised to see not a single man alive on the deck of the Frolic, except the seaman at the wheel, and three officers; and, of the whole crew, consisting, originally, of 110 men, all, except 20, were numbered among the killed, or the wounded. The Frolic mounted sixteen thirty-two pounders, four twelve-pounders on the main deck, and two twelve-pound carronades; while the Wasp mounted only sixteen thirty-two pounders, and two twelve-pound carronades; the superiority in number of cannon, was, therefore, on the side of the British, and the number of men was nearly equal; but the violent storm of the preceding day had crippled the Frolic, and to this cause was attributed the disastrous result. On the afternoon of the same day, his Majesty's ship, Poictiers, of 74 guns, commanded by Captain Sir John Beresford, hove in sight, and after re-capturing the Frolic, and making a prize of the Wasp, carried both the rival brigs into Bermuda. On the return of Captain Jones to the United States, he was every where received with demonstrations of gratitude and admiration. Early in the morning of the 25th of October, the Macedonian frigate, Captain Carden, in latitude 29 N. 29° 30' W. descried a ship, which proved to be a frigate of the first class, under American colours, commanded by Captain Decatur. At nine o'clock, the vessels were brought into action, and the Macedonian being to windward, had the advantage of engaging at her own distance. After the battle had raged about half an hour, Captain Carden came to close quarters. In this situation, it was soon discovered, that the superior force of the enemy was, if possible, more advantageous to him than it had been before, and the only hopes of the British commander rested upon some fortunate occurrence, which might turn the engagement in his favour, or at least afford him an opportunity of escape. With this hope, the battle was continued for upwards of two hours, and until the British frigate was a perfect wreck—an unmanageable log. The mizen-mast was shot away by the board, the top-mast carried off by the caps, the main-yard shivered in pieces, and the rigging completely destroyed; all the guns upon the quarter-deck and forecastle were disabled, and filled with wreck, except two; several shot had struck the vessel between wind and water; a large proportion of the crew were killed or wounded; and the enemy, who was comparatively in good order, was preparing to place herself in a raking position. In this disastrous situation, Captain Carden was reduced to the painful extremity of surrendering his Majesty's ship. Every effort that gallantry and skill could effect, had been put forth, and no other alternative remained. To have continued the action longer, would have been a wanton sacrifice of the lives of his brave crew; the Macedonian could no longer fight, and had become a mere target to receive the enemy's fire. Her first Lieutenant, Hope, was severely wounded in the head, towards the close of the action, and carried below, but no persuasion of his fellow-sufferers, nor any representation of the dangerous nature of the wound, could keep him from his post; after a slight dressing had been applied to his wound, he again rushed upon deck, and displayed that greatness of mind, and those persevering exertions, which may be equalled, but never can be excelled. The loss of the British was very severe; 36 men were killed, and the same number severely wounded, many of them without hopes of recovery: in addition to which, 32 were slightly wounded, constituting an aggregate number, exceeding one-third part of the whole crew. The masts, hull, and rigging of the American frigate had suffered considerably, but not at all in comparison with the Macedonian, and her loss, in killed and wounded, amounted only to five of the former, and seven of the latter. The congress of the United States, and other public bodies, emulated each other in awarding manifestations of public esteem to Captain Decatur and his crew. On the 29th of December, the Java frigate, Captain Lambert, off the coast of Brasil, on her passage to the East Indies, perceived a strange sail, which was soon found to be the American frigate the Constitution, under the command of Commodore William Bainbridge. The two frigates came into action about two o'clock in the afternoon, and the fire of the Americans was directed with so much skill and precision, against the masts and rigging of the Java, as to carry away the bowsprit and the jib-boom, and to disable her from preserving the weather-gage. The contest having raged for upwards of an hour, much to the disadvantage of the British, Captain Lambert endeavoured to extricate himself from the raking fire of the enemy, by ordering his ship to be laid on board; but, at this critical moment, when the disasters of the day might have been retrieved, his fore-mast was shot away, and the main-top-mast went overboard, leaving the ship totally unmanageable, and the principal part of her starboard guns rendered useless by the wreck under which they were buried. To aggravate the misfortunes of the Java, her gallant Captain received a dangerous wound in his breast, and was obliged to quit his station. The command devolved on Lieutenant Chads, who discharged his arduous duty in a manner worthy of his commander. It was clear, however, that all the efforts made to prevent the British frigate from falling into the hands of the Americans, would be unavailing. Her guns were so much covered that not more than two or three of them could be fired; while the enemy, comparatively little disabled either for manœuvring or fighting, and fully sensible of the crippled state of the Java, continued to pour into her hull, a destructive and well-directed fire. At five minutes past four o'clock, the Java's fire being completely silenced, and her colours no longer visible, Commodore Bainbridge, concluding that she had struck, shot a-head to repair his rigging; but, while engaged in this service, it was discovered that the British colours still waved from the stump of the mizen-mast. This discovery was no sooner made than the Constitution bore down again upon her, and having got close under her bows, was preparing to rake her with a broadside, when Lieutenant Chads, feeling that he could not be justified in squandering the blood of his crew in a resistance now become so utterly hopeless, surrendered his frigate with extreme reluctance into the hands of the enemy. It was soon perceived that the crew of the Java had fought their ship with so much gallantry, that she was not in a condition to be preserved as a trophy of American victory; and Commodore Bainbridge, having removed her crew and stores with all the expedition that his slender means would afford, ordered her to be destroyed. The loss, on both sides, was very great, but that of the Java, from the circumstances of the engagement, was the most severe. Captain Lambert survived the loss of his ship only six days, and by the returns made to the Admiralty, it appeared that 22 of his crew were killed, and 102 wounded. On the same authority, it is stated, that the Constitution had ten men killed, and 46 wounded; but the American accounts reduce their own loss to nine killed, and 25 wounded, among the latter of whom was the Commodore himself. The disparity of force between the Java and the Constitution, was nearly the same as between the Constitution and the Guerriere.

contest was engendered, shall have subsided, an impartial posterity will probably adjudge—that admitting the existence of the British orders in council, and the impressment of American seamen, to have justified the United States in declaring war against Britain, in the first instance; yet, when the former of these evils was removed, and when an offer to suspend hostilities by sea and land, was made through the medium of the British authorities in America, in order to adjust the still existing differences, it was the duty of the American government to accept the pacific overture. Since the revocation of the orders in council, there was in reality no principle at issue, between the two countries. The limits of the right of blockade stand fixed by the law of nations upon grounds that admit of no serious dispute. With regard to the impressment of seamen, America did not deny, that Great Britain had a right to reclaim her own subjects; and the English government did not pretend to have any right to impress any who were really and truly American citizens. The whole quarrel then was about the means of asserting these rights, and had the ministers of both countries sought for peace in the spirit of peace, that inestimable blessing must have been speedily obtained.

At the opening of the campaign of 1813, the American army of the west, was placed at the foot of Lake Erie, under General Harrison; the army of the centre, under Generals Wilkinson and Dearborn, in the vicinity of the falls of Niagara, between Lakes Erie and Ontario; and the army of the north, under General Hampton, on the banks of Lake Champlain. The object of these forces was to invade the two Canadas; and the duty which devolved upon Sir George Prevost, the Governor-General, or British Viceroy, was to resist their incursions, and to preserve the integrity of his Majesty's North American dominions. For this purpose, the defence of the Detroit frontier was confided to Colonels Proctor and Vincent; while General Sheaffe, acting under the more immediate direction of the Governor-General, was charged with the defence of Lower Canada. After the surrender of General Hull, no operation of importance took place on the Detroit frontier, till the month of January, 1813, when the American General Winchester, commanding the right wing of General Harrison's army, marched to the attack of Detroit, and concentrated his troops at the village of Frenchtown, on the river Raisin. On the 22d, the Americans, amounting to about 1000 men, were attacked by a combined British and Indian force, consisting of about 500 regulars and militia, and 600 Indians, under the command of Colonel Proctor. The attack commenced early in the morning, on the right wing of the American army, and was made with so much vigour and effect, that after a contest of about a quarter of an hour, they were driven across the river, where their retreat was cut off by a large body of Indians, stationed in their rear. The left wing, being fortified behind a picket-fence, sustained three separate charges; but, finding themselves at length exposed to a concentric fire, their General, who had been taken prisoner by a Wyandot Chief, early in the day, agreed to capitulate, and his whole corps was surrendered prisoners of war. In this short, but sanguinary engagement, the number of killed and wounded, on the part of the Americans, amounted to about 500, and their loss, in prisoners, to an equal number. Of the British troops, only 24 were killed, and 158 wounded. The slaughter made by the Indians, on the retreating division of the enemy, was terrible; scarcely one of them survived the battle. After the defeat of General Winchester, General Harrison retreated to Fort Meigs, and occupied himself in strengthening that position; while the brigade under General Cooks, was actively employed during the remainder of the winter, in fortifying Upper Sandusky. The frequent predatory incursions of the Americans, on the Canadian border, near the river St. Lawrence, induced Sir George Prevost, who arrived at Prescot, on the 21st of February, to direct an attack to be made upon the enemy's position at Ogdenburgh. On the 22d, Major Macdonnel, of the Glengarry light infantry fencibles, at the head of about 500 regulars and militia, crossed the river upon the ice, about seven o'clock in the morning.—The right, commanded by Captain Jenkins, of the Glengarry regiment, was directed to hold the enemy's left in check, and to interrupt his retreat, while Major Macdonnel moved on with the left column towards his position in the town, where he had posted his heavy field artillery. The depth of snow, in some degree, retarded the advance of both columns, and exposed them, particularly the right, to a heavy cross fire from the batteries of the enemy; but, pushing on rapidly, the left column soon gained the right bank of the river, and after encountering a few discharges of artillery, obliged the enemy's infantry to seek refuge in the houses or in the woods. During these transactions, Captain Jenkins gallantly led on his column, exposed to the heavy fire of seven guns, which he bravely attempted to take by the bayonet, though covered by 200 of the enemy's best troops. On advancing to the charge, his left arm was broken by a grape-shot; still undauntedly running on with his men, he almost immediately afterwards was deprived of the use of his right arm by a discharge of case-shot; disregarding all personal considerations, he continued nobly to advance, cheering his men, to the assault, till, exhausted by pain and loss of blood, he became unable to move; his company, however, continued to advance, under Lieutenant M'Auley; but the reserve of militia not being able to keep up with the regulars, they were compelled to give way, nearly about the time that Major Macdonnel gained the height. The enemy hesitating to surrender at the summons of the Major, his eastern battery was carried, and a detachment, under Captain Eustace, gallantly rushed into the fort, while the Americans, retreating to the opposite entrance, abandoned their works, and made their escape into the woods.

The gallantry and self-devotion of Captain Jenkins were the theme of universal admiration, and Sir George Prevost, in transmitting the report of this brilliant achievement to his government, earnestly recommended the mutilated hero to the favour and protection of his Prince. In the battle of Ogdenburgh, which lasted little more than an hour, the enemy lost eleven pieces of cannon, all his ordnance, marine, commissariat, and Quarter-Master-General's stores; 4 officers, and 70 privates, were taken prisoners; and two schooners, and two gun-boats, together with the barracks of Ogdenburgh, were consigned to the flames. The American army of the centre, at the commencement of the campaign, consisted of about 7000 men; 4000 of whom were stationed in the vicinity of Sackett's harbour, and the remaining 3000 at the head of the Niagara river, near Cape Buffalo. On the 22d of April, a corps of their best troops, amounting to 1600, under General Dearborn, embarked on board the flotilla, commanded by Commodore Chauncey, at Sackett's Harbour, and in the morning of the 27th, arrived off York, on the northern bank of Lake Ontario. The debarkation of the invaders was vigorously opposed by Major-General Sheaffe, at the head of 700 British, and 100 Indian troops; but, the superior numbers of the enemy enabled him to surmount every difficulty, and to make good his landing without any material loss. No sooner had the whole of their troops gained the banks of the lake, than they advanced through an intervening wood to the open ground, and after carrying one of the British batteries by assault, moved in columns towards the main works. At this moment, their progress was arrested by the accidental explosion of a large magazine; an immense quantity of stones flew in every direction; and General Pike, to whom the command of the advancing column was confided, became one of the numerous victims of this dreadful casualty. Nor were the British troops wholly exempt from its effects; 10 at least of their number, fell before a force which neither skill nor bravery could resist. General Sheaffe, finding all further resistance unavailing, withdrew from the city, with his regular troops towards Kingston, leaving the commanding officer of the militia to treat with General Dearborn, for the surrender of the capital capital of Upper Canada. The loss of the American army, in the battle of York, amounted to 320, including 38 killed, and 222 wounded, by the explosion.—The British loss may be estimated at 400, of which number 300, at least, became prisoners. The next object of General Dearborn's expedition was the capture of Forts George and Erie, and on the 8th of May, the American troops evacuated the capital of Upper Canada, and proceeded to the Niagara frontier. At nine o'clock in the morning of the 27th, the American flotilla appeared off Fort George, and the debarkation of the light troops immediately commenced. The landing of the troops was vigorously resisted by Colonel Vincent, the British commander; but the numerical superiority of the assailants, combined with that coolness and intrepidity which experience imparts, and of which the Americans had already begun to shew several examples, overcame all opposition. It now became obvious, that the place would soon become untenable; and Colonel Vincent, having spiked his guns, and destroyed his magazines, abandoned Fort George to the enemy, but not till he had sustained a loss of upwards of 300 men. The capture of Fort Erie speedily succeeded the fall of Fort George; but these conquests were only transient, for before the end of the month of June, the superiority of the British fleet, under Sir James Yeo, became so decided, that the Americans, in their turn, were obliged to relinquish all the posts they had acquired on the left bank of the Niagara.

After the defeat and capture of General Winchester, the British troops, under Colonel, now General Proctor, advanced at the head of a force of 1000 regulars and militia, and 1200 Indians, to the river Miami, in expectation of reaching the army under General Harrison, which had taken post in Fort Meigs, near the foot of the Rapids. From the incessant and heavy rains, during which the British batteries were erected opposite the fort, it was not till the morning of the 1st of May, that the siege of Meigs could be commenced. The enemy, who occupied several acres of commanding ground, strongly defended by block-houses, well furnished with ordnance, had so completely intrenched himself as to render unavailing every effort to carry his position. On the morning of the 5th, while the fate of the fortress yet hung in suspense, an American officer arrived at Meigs, with a detachment of men from General Clay's division, bringing to the garrison, the welcome intelligence, that that General, with his whole force, amounting to 1300 men, was descending the river, and was at that moment but a few miles distant. Conceiving that the British army was now in his power, General Harrison dispatched orders to land one half of the advancing force on the side of the river opposite to the fort, and to co-operate with him in an attempt to force the British batteries, and to spike their cannon. Colonel Dudley, the officer charged with the execution of this movement, advanced with so much vigour, that in a few minutes he was in possession of the batteries of the besiegers, and had taken some prisoners; but his troops, elevated unduly with their success, continued the pursuit till they were finally drawn into an ambush; and their whole number, with very few exceptions, was either killed or taken. Colonel Dudley, who was among the slain, displayed the most heroic firmness, and killed one of the Indian warriors after he had received his mortal wound. The officers and men of the 41st regiment, who, led on by Captain Muir, charged and routed the enemy after they had seized the batteries, maintained the long established reputation of the corps; and the courage and activity displayed throughout the whole scene of action by the Indian chiefs and warriors, contributed essentially to the successful issue of the engagement. The loss of the Americans, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, was estimated at between 1000 and 1200 men, a principal part of whom were not volunteers, but consisted of the Kentucky quota. However, before the ordnance could be withdrawn from the batteries, General Proctor found his 1200 Indian auxiliaries reduced to less than 20, and his army so much weakened, that on the morning of the 9th, he was obliged to raise the siege, and to retreat to his former station at Sandwich. On the 20th of July, he again advanced towards the head of Lake Erie; and, on the 2d of August, made an attack on Fort Stephenson, near the mouth of the river Sandusky, where the Americans had collected a small force, under Major-General Croghan. Finding the enemy determined to defend the fort, General Proctor resolved to carry the place by assault; the Indians, however, disliking this species of warfare, withdrew themselves out of the reach of the enemy's fire; and, although his Majesty's troops displayed the greatest bravery, they were repulsed after a short, but animated struggle, with the loss of about 100 men, and obliged once more to return to Sandwich. The failure of the British troops at Fort Stephenson, and the indications of disaffection exhibited by the Indians, on that occasion, had encouraged an attempt on the part of the Americans, to detach, from the British army, their native allies; and, with this view, a deputation of chiefs in the interest of the enemy, were dispatched to hold a "talk" with their brethren; but the contempt with which their proposal was received, and the determination expressed by the Indians in the British interest, to adhere to the cause of their great father in England, extinguished these hopes, and put an end to the negociation.

Whatever might be the numerical superiority of the Americans on land, it seemed reasonable to expect, that Britain would retain the naval ascendancy; and, that her ample resources would enable her at all times to contend successfully with the enemy on the frontier lakes of Canada. The importance of this preponderance had become so manifest to the Governor-General, that he had made repeated applications for reinforcements; but, it was not till the month of October, that shipping suitable for this service, arrived at Montreal. In the meantime the British, or rather the Canadian fleet, commanded by Captain Barclay; and the American fleet, under the command of Captain Perry; met near the head of Lake Erie. In the morning of the 10th of September, the American squadron, while lying at anchor in Put-in-Bay, discovered the British fleet, and immediately got under way to give them battle. At ten o'clock in the forenoon both fleets formed in line, and cleared for action. The lightness of the wind occasioned them to approach slowly, and prolonged the awful interval of suspense till mid-day. On the approach of Captain Perry's ship, the Lawrence, a heavy fire was opened upon her from the Detroit, which, from the shortness of her guns, she was at first unable to return. The American Captain, without waiting for his lighter vessels, kept steadily on his course, and approached so near that it seemed to be his intention to board. For some time the battle was decidedly in favour of the British; their shot pierced the side of the Lawrence in all directions, and her decks were strewed with the dead, while the wounded, in considerable numbers, were carried below. Perceiving the hazard of his situation, the American Commodore advanced still further, and ordered the other vessels to follow, for the purpose of closing with the British fleet. For two hours the contest was continued with unabated vigour; and Captain Perry at length, finding the Lawrence incapable of further service, determined to transfer his flag to the Niagara, which was at that moment warmly engaged. Soon after the Commodore's flag began to wave on the Niagara, the Lawrence, being rendered totally incapable of further defence, struck her flag. No sooner had Captain Perry taken his station on board the Niagara than a signal was made for close action; and passing a-head of the British ships, in order to break their line, he gave them a raking fire with his starboard guns, and laid his ship along-side of the Detroit. The smaller American vessels having, in the meantime, advanced within grape and cannister shot distance, and kept up a well directed fire, the Queen Charlotte struck, and all the other British vessels were obliged to submit to the same fate. The engagement, which which was gallantly contested, lasted three hours, and the victory on the part of the enemy was decisive. The loss on both sides was severe; and of the crew of the Lawrence, scarcely any individual, except the Captain, escaped the shower of shot with which she was for upwards of two hours assailed. The return made by Captain Perry of the killed and wounded on board his fleet, amounted to 123; the British loss, was 41 killed, and 94 wounded, among the former of whom was Captain Finnis, of the Queen Charlotte, and his first Lieutenant; and among the latter Captain Barclay himself. This capture of the British squadron was the precursor, and in some degree, the cause, of the relinquishment of the Michigan territory, and the abandonment of all the posts in Upper Canada, beyond the Great River.

Early in September, General Harrison began to concentrate his force, near the mouth of the Miami, and once more to prepare for a descent on Canada. On the 17th of that month, Governor Shelby, with a reinforcement of four thousand volunteers, arrived at the American head quarters; and on the 20th, General M'Arthur's brigade joined the main army. Colonel Johnson's regiment of cavalry remained at Fort Meigs, but had orders to approach Detroit by land, and to advance, "pari passu," with the commander-in-chief, who was to move in boats to Malden. Commodore Perry was actively engaged in transporting the troops and baggage to their destination; and on the 27th General Harrison's army debarked three miles from Malden. On advancing to that place, instead of the regimentals of the British, and the war whoop of the Indians, a group of well dressed females presented themselves, and on behalf of themselves and the inhabitants implored mercy and protection. It was now discovered that Malden had been abandoned by General Proctor, who had determined to fall back for the purpose of taking a station on the river Thames. Sandwich and Detroit, thus abandoned to their fate, fell successively into the hands of the invaders; but before General Proctor quitted these places he had taken the precaution to dismantle the ports, and to destroy the public buildings and stores of every description. On the 2d of October General Harrison had completed his arrangements for advancing in pursuit of the retreating British troops, and on the morning of the 5th the hostile armies came in contact at the Moravian village, situated on the right bank of the Thames, about forty miles from its entrance into Lake Clair. The British force, which was advantageously drawn up in line of battle, on the banks of the river, was estimated at 500 men, supported by about 1200 Indians. The numerical strength of the American army was nearly double this amount, including 1000 irregular cavalry. The right division of the American army, consisting principally of horse, advanced to the charge with great impetuosity, and in an instant the British lines were broken, and the enemy formed into their rear. This sudden and unexpected manœuvre was decisive of the fate of the day. On the left of the enemy's position the contest was more serious, but not less successful. Colonel Johnson, who commanded the Americans on that flank, encountered a steady resistance on the part of the Indians, who, by their gallant conduct, rescued themselves from the disgrace at Fort Stephenson. Tecumseh, one of the most distinguished of their chiefs, and the brother of the prophet, was personally opposed to Colonel Johnson, and was advancing upon him with an uplifted tomahawk, when the Colonel, observing his approach, drew a pistol from his holster, and laid his brave adversary dead at his feet.* At the moment of the fall of Tecumseh, the Indians, who till now had maintained their ground with great bravery, gave way; and General Proctor, perceiving that all was lost, ordered his troops to disperse, and sought his own safety in flight. Among the trophies taken by the Americans in the battle of the Thames, were six brass field pieces, which had been surrendered by General Hull, and on two of which were inscribed, "Surrendered by Burgoyne at Saratoga." The American army, having effected the object of their expedition, returned to Detroit, but before their departure they destroyed Moravian village, attempting to palliate this enormity, on the ground that the Indian inhabitants had been among the foremost in massacring the Americans at the river Raisin; and on the further plea, that the town, if spared, would have afforded a convenient shelter for their British allies during the winter.

General Proctor, after his retreat from Moravian village, repaired to Ancaster, on the Grand River, where he collected the shattered remains of his army, amounting to about 200 men, and from thence marched to Burlington Heights, General Vincent's head quarters.

On the 31st of July, the Ontario fleet, under Commodore Chauncey, consisting at that period of twelve sail, and carrying a military force, under Lieutenant-Colonel Scott, made its appearance off York; but, after throwing open the public jail, and destroying the store houses of some of the private inhabitants, they again evacuated the town, and took to their vessels. The attention of the enemy was soon drawn from these predatory excursions to the defence of their own settlements; and a number of naval officers and seamen were dispatched from Quebec, on board a flotilla of gunboats, for the purpose of co-operating with a small, but chosen body of troops, under Lieutenant-Colonel Murray, in various demonstrations on Lake Champlain. On the 29th of July the objects of this service were fully accomplished by the total destruction of all the enemy's arsenals, block-houses, and stores of every description, at Plattsburgh, Swanton, and Champlain Town; and the conflagration of the extensive barracks at Saranac, capable of containing four thousand troops. This important service was performed with a degree of promptitude and regularity highly honourable to the officers directing the expedition, and without the loss of a single man.

It was now publicly announced, that the two armies under Generals Wilkinson and Hampton, consisting of from 8 to 10,000 men each, would take up their winter quarters at Montreal. The attack on Lower Canada was to be made by a combined operation of the armies of the north and of the centre, and while the former, under General Hampton, marched on Montreal from Lake Champlain, taking the route of the Chateaugay; the latter, under General Wilkinson, was directed to sail down the St. Lawrence for the same destination. On the morning of the 21st of October, General Hampton crossed the line of separation between the British dominions and the United States, and commenced his movements along the banks of the river. After some days spent in completing his arrangements and bringing up his stores and artillery, he advanced on the 25th in front of the British position, which he found supported by a wood of some miles in extent, formed into an entire abattis, and filled by a succession of breastworks, well supplied with ordnance. Early in the forenoon of the 20th the American light troops and cavalry were discovered advancing on both banks of the Chateaugay. Lieutenant-Colonel De Salaberry, who had the command of the advanced picquets of the British army, composed of the light infantry company of the Canadian fencibles, and two companies of voltigeurs, stationed on the north side of the river, made so excellent a disposition of his little band, as to check the advance of the enemy's principal column, led by General Hampton in person, and accompanied by Brigadier-General Izard: while the American light brigade, under Colonel M'Carty, was in like manner arrested in its progress on the south side of the river, by the spirited advance of the right flank company of the third battalion of the embodied militia, under Captain Daly, supported by Captain Bruyer's company of Chateaugay chasseurs. In the course of the day the enemy rallied repeatedly, and returned to the attack, but all their efforts proved unavailing: and on the approach of evening they were obliged finally to retire, being foiled on all points by a handful of men, who, by their determined bravery, maintained their position in the face of an enemy twenty times their number. The Governor-General, having arrived on the scene of action shortly after the appearance of the enemy, witnessed the gallant conduct of the troops on this glorious occasion, and had the satisfaction to award, on the spot, that praise which had become so justly their due. From the report of prisoners taken from the enemy in the affair of Chateaugay, it appeared that the American force consisted of 7000 infantry, and 200 cavalry, with ten field pieces; while the British advanced force, actually engaged, did not exceed 300. The entire loss of both armies, in killed, wounded, and missing, according to the official dispatches transmitted to their governments by the hostile Generals, was estimated at 75 men, of which the British lost only 25; and the Americans not more than double that number. After this memorable repulse the American commander called a council of war, at which it was determined, that under existing circumstances, it was not prudent to renew the attack; but that, on the contrary, the army should immediately return, by orderly marches, to such a position as would secure their communication with the United States, either to retire into winter quarters, or to be ready to strike below. The American troops engaged in the expedition under General Wilkinson, were not more fortunate in the enterprise upon which they had now entered than their compatriots of the northern army. Early in the month of October, General Wilkinson, at the head of an army of 10,000 men, embarked at Fort George, on board the Ontario flotilla, consisting of upwards of 300 vessels, and having entered the St. Lawrence on the 2d of November, arrived on the 6th within a few miles of the port of Prescot. The powder and stores were here landed on the Canadian side of the river, to be transported by land, under cover of the night, beyond the British batteries; and all the troops were debarked to march at the same hour to a bay two miles below Prescot. The vigilance of the British troops, was not to be surprised; and in this attempt to pass the fortress of Prescot, the American armada was doomed to sustain a heavy and destructive cannonade; while the army on shore, under the command of Brigadier-General Boyd, was briskly assailed by the garrison with shot and shells. The advance of the enemy, subsequent to the passage of Prescot, was retarded by the menacing position of the British army, which hung upon his rear, and by the difficulties of the navigation of the St. Lawrence, which exposed his flotilla to continually increasing dangers. Having anticipated the probability of the American government sending its whole force from Lake Ontario towards Montreal, the British Governor-General had ordered a corps of observation, consisting of the remains of the 49th regiment, the second battalion of the 89th, and three companies of voltigeurs, with a division of gun-boats, the whole under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Morrison, of the 89th regiment, to advance from Kingston, and to follow the movements of General Wilkinson's army. On the 11th, this corps of observation was attacked at Williamsberg by a part of the American force, under General Boyd, consisting of two brigades of infantry, and a regiment of cavalry. About half past two the action became general, when the enemy endeavoured, by moving forward a brigade from the right, to turn the British left, but was repulsed by the 89th forming in potence with the 49th, and both corps moving forward, occasionally firing by platoons. Finding himself unsuccessful on the left, the next efforts of the enemy were directed against the right, but he was received in so gallant a manner by the companies of the 89th, under Captain Barnes, and by a well directed fire from the artillery, that he quickly retreated, leaving one of his guns in the hands of the British. Colonel Morrison, in his turn, now became the assailant, and the enemy concentrated his force to prevent his advance; but such was the steady countenance and well directed fire of the troops, and the artillery, that about half past four the Americans gave way on all sides, and abandoned their strong position. By a judicious movement made at this moment by Lieutenant-Colonel Pearson, their light infantry, which had been left to cover their retreat, was dislodged, and the British detachment for the night occupied the ground from which the enemy had suffered themselves to be driven. The army of the victors did not exceed 800 men, while that of the vanquished amounted to from three to 4000. The loss of the Americans in killed and wounded amounted to 339, including upwards of 100 prisoners. On the side of the British, the loss, in relation to the number engaged, was heavy, and amounted to 180, including twelve missing.

The American army, depressed by their disasters, re-embarked the whole of their forces on the 13th, and crossed the St. Lawrence to St. Regis and Salmon River, on their own shores, not leaving a man on the Canadian territory, except such as were prisoners.*

The attention of the British army, under Major-General Vincent, and Lieutenant General Drummond, was now directed to the Niagara frontier; and on the 10th of December, Colonel Murray was ordered to advance, for the purpose of checking a system of plunder organized by the enemy against the loyal inhabitants of that district. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, the British force arrived in the neighbourhood of Fort George in time to compel the enemy, under General M'Clure, to abandon the whole of the British side of the Niagara frontier; but not till that General had stained the character of his country by the wanton conflagration of the town of Newark, which, under the pretence of securing the American frontier, but in violation of the laws of nations, he reduced to a heap of ashes.

The enemy, no longer secure within his own dominions, abandoned Lewistown on the advance of Major-General Riall, leaving in the place a considerable supply of small arms and ammunition, with about 200 barrels of flour. Early in the morning of the 19th of December, Colonel Murray, at the head of a detachment of the 100th regiment, the grenadier company of the royals, and the flank companies of the 41st regiment, advanced to Fort Niagara, where, having surprised the sentries on the glacis of the fortress, the watchword was obtained, and the place carried in a few minutes, with the trifling loss of six men killed, and five wounded. The loss of the garrison was much more considerable, 65 of their number were killed, 14 wounded, and 344 made prisoners. By this gallant achievement, 27 pieces of cannon, 3000 stand of arms, a number of rifles, and the store houses, well stocked with clothing, and camp equipage of every description, fell into the hands of the victors.

On the same day that the fortress of Niagara was carried by Colonel Murray, Lewistown surrendered without resistance to the forces under Major-General Riall. During the night of the 30th that General crossed the Niagara, for the purpose of attacking the enemy at Black Rock and Buffalo, at the head of a detachment, consisting of four companies of the King's regiment, the light company of the 89th, two hundred and fifty of the 41st regiment, and the grenadiers of the 100 regiment; with a small body of militia volunteers, and a number of Indian warriors. At day break on the following morning, the King's regiment, and light company of the 89th, moved forward; the grenadiers of the 41st and 100th regiment being in reserve. On the approach of the British troops, the enemy opened a very heavy fire of cannon and musquetry on the royal Scots, under Lieutenant-Colonel Gordon, who was directed to land above Black Rock, for the purpose of turning his position, but who, owing to the boats in which the troops were embarked having grounded, was not able to land in sufficient time to accomplish that object. The King's and the 89th, having, in the mean time, gained the town, commenced a spirited attack upon the Americans under General Hall. The position, which was strong, was for some time supported with much bravery; but such was the gallant and determined advance of the British troops, that he was at length driven from his batteries, and pursued to the town of Buffalo, about two miles distant. General Hall, finding his force now swelled to upwards of 2000 men, again attempted to arrest the progress of the advancing columns; but finding all his efforts ineffectual, his troops fled in disorder, and betook themselves to the woods. Eight pieces of ordnance, and 130 prisoners, fell into the hands of the British, and the enemy's loss in killed and wounded was estimated at from three to 400. General Riall now proceeded to execute the ulterior objects of the expedition; and Colonel Robinson was detached to destroy a sloop and two schooners, part of the Ontario flotilla, which lay a little below the town. The town itself, the inhabitants having previously abandoned it, and the whole of the public stores, consisting of a considerable quantity of clothing, spirits, and flour, which the British army had not the means of conveying away, were then set on fire, and totally consumed. A similar fate awaited Black Rock; and on the evening of the same day that village was consigned to the flames. These terrible inflictions were not deemed sufficient to retaliate the destruction of the town of Newark; and in obedience to the further instructions of General Drummond, Lieutenant-Colonel Gordon, with a detachment of the 19th and 89th regiments, moved down the river to Fort Niagara, and destroyed the remaining cover of the enemy upon this frontier. A dreadful scene of desolation now presented itself; all the towns and villages on the American side of the communicating river between Lakes Erie and Ontario were destroyed, and the concluding scenes of the campaign of the present year, assumed the character of a war of extermination.*

* On the preceding day, General Wilkinson, who had been confined to his bed during the principal part of the voyage down the St. Lawrence, received a dispatch from General Hampton, in which that officer declined to join his troops to the army of the centre, on account of the limited supply of provisions, intimating, however, that he should retire to Plattsburg, with the intention of opening a communication between the two armies lower down the river. This letter General Wilkinson considered as a refusal on the part of General Hampton to co-operate; and at a council of war, consisting of the principal officers of his army, it was determined, "that the attack on Montreal should be abandoned for the present season," and that the army should go into winter quarters.

Ever since the month of February, Captain Broke, of the Shannon, had been cruising in the Bay of Boston, in company with the Tenedos, in hopes that the Chesapeake (Captain Lawrence) would come out of the harbour; but the enemy not choosing to encounter two British frigates, Captain Broke directed the Tenedos to cruise at a distance from the coast, and not to rejoin him till after the expiration of a month. In order that Captain Lawrence might be informed of the separation of the vessels, and be induced in consequence to put to sea, the Shannon stood close into Boston light-house, and hoisted the British colours. The challenge, conveyed by this posture of defiance, Captain Lawrence was not slow to accept; and at mid-day, on the 1st of June, the Chesapeake weighed anchor, and stood out of the harbour, to decide, as it were, by single combat, the contest between the two nations in maritime prowess. About twenty-five minutes after five o'clock the two frigates were within musket shot of each other; and it is scarcely possible to conceive a more interesting and awful moment. The engagement, which was about to commence, had few features in common with the usual routine of sea fights; there was, on the contrary, something chivalrous in the situation of the combatants; each commander, as well as the respective crews, had offered themselves as the champions of their country's glory and honour; and by this feeling it may be supposed that the Americans were more particularly influenced, as the engagement was about to commence within sight of their own shores, which were lined by the inhabitants, who could observe with ease all the vicissitudes of a combat so interesting. The Chesapeake, on her advance, was manœuvred with so much skill as to call for the admiration of the British Captain; and three American ensigns waved from their masts, on one of which was inscribed, "Free Trade and Sailors' Rights." At half past five the enemy placed himself on the starboard side of the Shannon, and the battle began. After the exchange of two or three broadsides, the enemy's frigate fell on board the Shannon, and they became locked in each other's rigging. Captain Broke, observing that the enemy were flinching from their guns, determined to bring the battle to an immediate and glorious issue, and gave orders to prepare for boarding. Placing himself at the head of his gallant bands, appointed to that service, they instantly rushed upon the enemy's decks, impelling every thing before them with irresistible fury. The enemy made a desperate but disorderly resistance; and the firing was continued at all the gangways, and between the tops; but in two minutes they were driven sword in hand from every post; the American flag was hauled down, and "the proud old British union floated triumphantly over it." In another minute the enemy ceased firing from below, and called for quarter; and the whole service was achieved in fifteen minutes from the commencement of the action.

The message of the American President at the opening of the Congress, on the 7th of November, 1813, announced, that Great Britain had declined an offer which had been made by the Emperor Alexander, to mediate the existing differences between that power and the United States; and under such circumstances, the President conceived, that a nation proud of its rights, and conscious of its strength, had no choice but in exertion of the one in support of the other. The door of negociation was not, however, finally closed, for while Great Britain was disinclined to commit the decision of the question at issue to the mediation of a power that, in common with America, might be disposed to circumscribe her maritime claims, she professed a readiness to nominate plenipotentiaries to treat directly with the plenipotentiaries of the American government, and expressed an earnest wish that their conferences might result in establishing between the two nations the blessings and reciprocal advantages of peace. This proposal, which was communicated by Lord Castlereagh to the American secretary of state on the 4th of November, was accepted by the government of the United States without hesitation, and Gottenburg, being neutral territory, was fixed upon as the place at which the plenipotentiaries should meet.

At the early part of the year 1814, the war with America was suffered to languish; but no sooner had Europe been restored to peace, by the dethronement

* On the 24th of March, the American brig Hornet, Captain Lawrence, and the English brig Peacock, Captain William Peake, met at sea, off Demarara, and at half past five o'clock in the afternoon they passed within range of each other's guns, and exchanged broadsides. Observing the British Captain in the act of wearing, Captain Lawrence bore up and received his starboard broadside, after which he approached close on the starboard quarter, and in that position kept up such a heavy and well directed fire, that in less than fifteen minutes, the Peacock, being rendered unmanageable, was obliged to strike her flag. With much difficulty, the Americans succeeded in bringing their prize to anchor; but before the prisoners could be removed she went down, carrying with her thirteen of her own crew, and three of the American sailors. Captain Peake, and four of his crew, were found dead on board the sinking vessel, and 33 others were wounded. The loss of the Americans was trifling in comparison, and in the return made by Captain Lawrence to the secretary of the navy, it is stated, that the number of killed and wounded did not exceed five men, of whom one only was killed. The Peacock is represented as one of the finest vessels of her class in the British navy, and in size, guns, and crew, the combatants were nearly equal. On the return of Captain Lawrence to America he was received with every possible mark of distinction; and as a testimony of the estimation in which his talents and bravery were held by his government, he was appointed to the command of the Chesapeake frigate, then lying in the port of Boston.

of Buonaparte, than the British government resolved to prosecute the contest with increased vigour. The peace of Paris was scarcely ratified before 14,000 of those troops, which had gained so much renown under the Duke of Wellington, were embarked at Bourdeaux for Canada; and about the same time a strong naval force, with an adequate number of troops, was collected, and dispatched for the purpose of invading different parts of the coast of North America.

On the 30th of March, the position of Odell-town, in Canada, under the command of Major Hancock, was attacked with considerable vigour; but the assailants were repulsed with considerable loss, and obliged to retreat to Plattsburg. Before the reinforcements from Europe arrived, an expedition was undertaken, under the command of General Drummond and Commodore Sir James Yeo, against the fort of Oswego, on Lake Ontario. On the 6th of May preparations were made for commencing the attack, but it was soon discovered that the garrison had made their escape, and General Drummond took possession of the town and fort without opposition. After the barracks had been destroyed, and all the damage inflicted upon the works that was found practicable, the troops re-embarked, bringing away seven heavy guns, and a quantity of stores. Another attempt, on a small scale, made on Sandy Creek, by Captain Popham, of the navy, in concert with Captain Spilsbury, proved unfortunate, and was attended with a loss of 18 men killed, and 50 dangerously wounded. A large American force, under Major-General Brown, crossed the Niagara river on the 3d of July, and, advancing against Fort Erie, demanded the surrender of the garrison. Major Buck, to whom the command of the fort was confided, appears to have been very ill informed of the hostile movement by which he was assailed; and, instead of atoning for his want of vigilance by a gallant defence, he surrendered the fort at the first summons, himself, and 140 men, being made prisoners of war. After the fall of Fort Erie, General Brown advanced towards the British lines of Chippaway; but no sooner was Major-General Riall, who commanded the British troops in the neighbourhood, made acquainted with this movement, than he ordered the immediate advance of five companies of royal Scots, to enforce the garrison, while a detachment of the 100th regiment, with a body of militia, and a few Indians, moved forward for the purpose of reconnoitring the position, and ascertaining the number of the enemy. Early in the morning of the 5th several affairs of posts took place, and at four o'clock in the afternoon both armies were drawn up in battle array on a plain, about a mile to the west of Chippaway. After much severe fighting, a heavy discharge of cannister shot was poured on the British infantry, and General Riall, no longer able to sustain this accumulated fire, ordered the attack to be abandoned, and the troops to retire behind their works at Chippaway. In this engagement, which closed only with the day, Lieutenant-Colonel Gordon, of the royal Scots, and Lieutenant-Colonel the Marquis of Tweedale, late aide-de-camp to the Duke of Wellington, were both wounded, as were most of the officers belonging to their respective regiments. The loss was estimated at about 500 on each side.

General Riall now retreated to a position near Fort Niagara; and the American army took post at Chippaway. On the arrival of General Drummond at Niagara, on the morning of the 25th of July, he advanced at the head of a considerable force towards the Falls; and scarcely had he formed a junction with General Riall, when intelligence arrived that the American army, under General Brown, was again advancing. The British General immediately proceeded to meet the enemy, whom he found strongly posted on a rising ground at Bridgewater, near the Falls of Niagara, and within the sound of the thunders of that stupendous cataract. On the arrival of General Brown upon the field, he found that the first brigade had passed the wood, near the Falls, and that the 9th, 11th, and 22d regiments, with Townson's artillery, were engaged on the Queenstown road, directing their principal efforts against the left and centre of the British. The eminence occupied by the British artillery, supported by the 2d battalion of the 89th regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Morrison, was conceived by General Brown to be the key of the whole position, and Colonel Miller was ordered to advance and carry the height at the point of the bayonet. The struggle at this point was arduous in the extreme; and the British troops, finding themselves severely pressed, formed round the colours of the 89th, and fought with invincible bravery. About the same time Major Jessup succeeded in turning the British left flank; and General Riall, having received a severe wound in his arm, was intercepted by Captain Ketchum's detachment as he was passing to the rear, and made prisoner. In the centre, the repeated and determined attacks of the Americans were met with the most perfect steadiness and intrepid gallantry, and they were constantly repulsed with very heavy loss. These attacks were directed against the guns of the British with so much vigour and determination, that the artillery men were bayoneted in the act of loading their cannon, and the muzzles of the enemy's guns were advanced within a few yards of those by which they were opposed. The night, which had now closed in upon the combatants, failed to put an end to the battle, and, during this extraordinary conflict, the two armies, mistaking each other's guns, actually made an exchange, by which the enemy obtained one, and the British two pieces. The battle, having raged three hours, was suspended about nine o'clock by mutual consent; during which time the enemy was employed in bringing up his reserves. In a short time the action was renewed; and General Porter, at the head of his New York and Pennsylvania volunteers, made a gallant charge, which retrieved the character of the corps, and called forth the praises of the commander of the American army. About this period General Drummond received a reinforcement of troops, under Colonel Scott, consisting of the 103d regiment, the head quarter divisions of the royal Scots, and King's, and the flank companies of the 104th regiment. This seasonable supply of troops seems to have decided the fortune of the day; and at midnight, the enemy, finding all his efforts to obtain possession of the hill unavailing, gave up the contest, and retreated to his camp beyond Chippaway, carrying with him the wounded and the artillery. On the day following he abandoned his camp, throwing the greater part of his baggage, camp equipage, and provisions, into the rapids; and, having destroyed the bridge at Chippaway, continued his retreat towards Fort Erie. "The loss sustained by the enemy in this severe action, cannot," says General Drummond, "be estimated at less than 1500 men, including several hundred prisoners; his two commanding Generals, Brown and Scott, were both wounded; his whole force, which has never been rated at less than 5000, having been engaged. The number of troops under my command did not, for the first three hours, exceed sixteen hundred men; and the addition of the troops under Colonel Scott did not increase it to more than 2,800 of every description." The battle of Bridgewater was, without exception, the most sanguinary, and decidedly the best fought, action which had taken place on the American continent. The repeated charges, and the actual contest with the bayonet, are alone sufficient to render this engagement remarkable; and the charge made by Colonel Miller, on the crest of the British position, is said to have exhibited traits of heroism inferior only to those displayed at the storming of St. Sebastian. A resolution was now formed to attempt the re-capture of Fort Erie; and for this purpose General Drummond, who had advanced to that place, opened the fire of his batteries against it on the 13th of August. In one of the severe actions which ensued, the loss of the British amounted, in killed, wounded, and missing, to upwards of 900 men; and both Colonel Scott and Lieutenant-Colonel Drummond were numbered among the slain. The loss of the British army was greatly aggravated by a sortie made upon their works before Fort Erie on the 17th of September, from the details of which, as stated in the American reports, it appears that a due degree of vigilance did not prevail in the camp. Early in the morning of that day, the infantry and riflemen, both of the regulars and militia, were ordered by General Brown, who had now resumed the command, to hold themselves in a state of readiness to march against the English batteries. At twelve o'clock General Porter was ordered to move, at the head of his detachment, by a passage previously opened through the woods, for the purpose of attacking the right of the besieging army. General Miller was, at the same time, directed to occupy the ravine between Fort Erie and the batteries; while General Ripley was posted with a corps of reserve between the two bastions of the fort. Soon after three o'clock in the afternoon, General Porter's column, which was destined to penetrate to the rear of the British batteries, and to turn their right, carried a strong block-house by storm; while General Miller, advancing from the ravine, pierced the intrenchments, and within half an hour from the time that the first gun was fired, two of the batteries out of the three were in possession of the enemy. The fate of the remaining battery was soon after decided, and the assailants, having spiked the British guns, and destroyed one of the magazines, withdrew within their own lines. Thus, in the short space of one hour, the fruits of fifty days' labour were destroyed, and the efficient force of the British army diminished at least 1000 men, of whom 385 were made prisoners. The aggregate loss of the Americans amounted to 511, of whom 45 were officers, and the remainder non-commissioned officers and privates. After the destruction of his works before Fort Erie, General Drummond broke up his camp, and returned on the night of the 21st to his intrenchments behind Chippaway.

On the advance of the British army to Plattsburgh, the southern part of which city is washed by the waters of the Saranac, at their junction with Cumberland Bay, the American General ordered the planks to be taken off the bridges, and piled up in the form of breast works, to cover the parties intended to dispute the passage of the river. From the 7th to the 11th Sir George Prevost was employed in bringing up his battering train; and Captain Downie, who had recently been appointed to command the British fleet on Lake Champlain, was urged to advance into the Bay of Plattsburgh, in order to co-operate with the land forces. The British army now only waited the arrival of the flotilla, and at seven o'clock in the morning of the 11th the vessels were seen over the isthmus which joins Cumberland Head with the main land, steering for the bay, with the determination to engage the American flotilla, under Commodore Macdonough. At the same instant the batteries were opened upon the enemy's position of the Saranac, and the brigades under Major-General Robinson and Major-General Power, were ordered to force the ford, and to escalade the enemy's works upon the heights. The action, however, having terminated unsuccessfully, on the part of the British, the batteries were dismantled on the evening of the same day; and, at two o'clock the next morning, the army retreated, leaving a large proportion of the sick, wounded, and stores, in the hands of the enemy. The estimate of the loss of every kind sustained by the British, as made by the Americans, is enormous; but the return, transmitted by Sir George Prevost, of the loss in action between the 6th and the 14th of September, does not amount to 250 men. The desertions however swelled this number to a large amount, and every idea of penetrating into the enemy's country from the side of Lower Canada was abandoned. In Canada the complaints were loud and general against Sir George Prevost; the flotilla, it was said, had been sacrificed by his precipitancy; and the officers of his army were of opinion, that even without naval co-operation Plattsburgh might have been carried, had not the peremptory orders of the Governor-General obliged them reluctantly to retreat within their own frontier.

Subsequently to the affair of Pig Point, on the 22d of August, which terminated advantageously to the British, the commanders, Admiral Cochrane and General Ross, determined to make an attack upon the city of Washington; which, having been abandoned by the Americans, upon their approach, was entered by General Ross, at eight o'clock in the evening of the 24th; when, judging it of consequence, to complete the destruction of the public buildings with the least possible delay, the capitol, including the senate house, and house of representation, was consigned to the flames, and the arsenal, the dock yard, the treasury, the war office, and the president's palace, with a rope walk, and the great bridge across the Potowmack, shared the same fate. In the dock yard, a frigate nearly ready to be launched, and a sloop of war, were consumed. The object of this expedition being thus accomplished, General Ross determined to withdraw the troops before any great force of the enemy could be assembled. On the evening of the 25th the army left Washington; and having reached Benedict on the 29th, the whole force, estimated at 5000 men, was embarked on the following day without molestation. The total loss of the British, in the battle of Bladenburg, amounted only to 64 killed, and 185 wounded; and the loss of the American army, as stated in their own accounts, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, amounted only to 180. Two hundred and six pieces of canon, 540 barrels of gun-powder, and 100,000 ball-cartridges, swelled the trophies of the victorious army; and the repeated explosions which took place in the city of Washington and its neighbourhood during the night of the 24th, sufficiently proved that the injury suffered by the enemy was still more considerable.*

The battle of New Orleans which subsequently took place, was distinguished by several striking characteristics: the troops engaged on each side may be estimated at a moderate computation at 10,000; and, since the breaking out of the war, no engagement had perhaps been fought with so much bravery, and none certainly with so disastrous a result. The loss of the British, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, amounted to 2040, including in that number the commander-in-chief, and two other general officers, one of whom, General Gibbs, survived his wounds only till the following day. The loss of the enemy, according to the official statement of their general, was incredibly small, and did not exceed six killed, and seven wounded, exclusively of the casualties, on the right bank of the river, by the addition of which the whole number was only swelled to 71. This heavy loss on the part of the British army extinguished all hopes of success, and General Lambert, after holding a consultation with Admiral Cochrane, came to the decision to re-embark the troops, and to abandon the enterprise. The concluding operation of the war in the Gulph of Mexico was the capture of Fort Bowyer on Mobile Point. On the 7th of February, the fort was invested by Captain Ricketts, of the Vengeur, and in the course of a few days the trenches were pushed within pistol shot of the works. Lieutenant-Colonel Lawrence, the American commander, finding it impossible much longer to resist the overwhelming force by which he was assailed, consented to capitulate, and on the 11th the garrison, consisting of 366 men, surrendered themselves prisoners of war. Before these events took place, the labours of the plenipotentiaries, assembled at Ghent, were, as before related, brought to a close; and the sanguinary operations on the shores of the Mexican Gulph, may be ranked among the posthumous offspring of an unnatural contest between two countries, whose true interest it is, at all times, to cherish the relations of peace, and to administer to each other's prosperity by a free interchange of commercial communication. In both countries the termination of the war was hailed with unfeigned satisfaction; but the force of this feeling was considerably diminished by the reflection, that all the blood and treasure expended in the prosecution of the contest had been lavished in vain, and that the questions in dispute remained without adjustment.

* The destruction of public property, at Washington (exclusive of the public library) was estimated at the sum of 969,171 dollars.

THE LAST YEARS OF GEORGE THE THIRD.

A. D. 1817.] WE are now rapidly approaching towards the close of that reign, which we have already described as auspicious in its commencement; bright and dazzling in its progress; sublime and beautiful in its results. Such at least is the sentiment which is entertained by those who regard, as a blessing, the glorious and honourable termination of one of the most sanguinary wars that ever desolated the earth.

The parliament of the United Kingdom was opened on the 28th of January, 1817, by his Royal Highness the Prince Regent in person. The chief topics of the royal speech were, the continued assurances of amity received from foreign powers; the splendid success of the bombardment of Algiers, and the consequent renunciation, by its government, of the practice of Christian slavery; and the termination, by treaty, of a victorious campaign against Nepaul, in India. Proceeding to affairs of finance, his Royal Highness apprized the House of Commons, that the annual estimates would shortly be laid before them; and that those estimates had been formed, under an anxious desire to make every reduction in the public establishments, which the safety of the empire and true policy would allow. His Royal Highness regretted to be obliged to inform them, that there had been a deficiency in the produce of the revenue in the preceding year; but he trusted that it was to be ascribed to temporary causes; and he had the consolation to believe, that they would find it practicable to provide for the service, without making any additions to the burdens of the people, and without adopting any means injurious to that system by which the public safety had been hitherto maintained. His Royal Highness thus concluded:—"In considering our internal situation, you will, I doubt not, feel a just indignation at the attempts which have been made to take advantage of the distresses of the country, for the purpose of exciting a spirit of sedition and violence.—I am too well convinced of the loyalty and good sense of the great body of his Majesty's subjects, to believe them capable of being perverted by the arts which are employed to seduce them; but I am determined to omit no precautions for preserving the public peace, and for counteracting the designs of the disaffected. And I rely with the utmost confidence on your cordial support and co-operation, in upholding a system of law and government from which we have derived inestimable advantages; which has enabled us to conclude, with unexampled glory, a contest whereon depended the best interests of mankind, and which has been hitherto felt by ourselves, as it is acknowledged by other nations, to be the most perfect that has fallen to the lot of any people."

The Prince Regent having withdrawn, the House of Lords adjourned till five o'clock; at which time, on their re-assembling, Lord Sidmouth announced an important communication, during the delivery of which strangers were ordered to withdraw. From the statement of his lordship, and from various other sources of information, it appeared that the Prince Regent, on his return from the House, had been assailed by an infatuated mob, and that acts of violence, apparently directed against his person, had been committed on his carriage. At half-past one in the day, his Royal Highness left Carlton House in his private carriage for St. James's; whence, after transacting some public business, he proceeded, in the accustomed state, to the House of Peers, there to open the session of parliament. In consequence, however, of the recent accouchement of the Duchess of Cumberland, certain customary ceremonials were dispensed with: the band did not play at the commencement of the procession; the appearance of the Regent was not greeted with the sound of trumpet; nor was the entrance of his Royal Highness, into the House of Peers, announced by a discharge of cannon from the Lambeth shore. In his progress through the Park, the Prince was received by a mixture of applause and disapprobation. The assemblage of people was very numerous—more so it was thought than had been witnessed on any similar occasion, since the attack which was made upon the king, in the year 1795. On the return of the procession, the number of mal-contents appeared to have been greatly increased; language, of the foulest and most threatening nature, was vociferated from every quarter; and, from the tumultuous violence which ensued, there was much reason to fear, that there were individuals amongst the mob, who entertained the horrible project of assassination. From the evidence of Lord James Murray, who attended the Regent in his carriage, as one of the Lords of the Bedchamber, it appeared that, on the return of his Royal Highness, between Carlton House and St. James's Gardens, the glass of the Prince's carriage, on the left side of his Royal Highness, was fractured, by what Lord Murray confidently believed to have been two bullets, fired, as he conjectured, from an air-gun. About a minute afterwards, the glass, upon the same side, was struck by a large stone: other stones followed, and the glass was actually smashed and pulverised. The Prince sat on the middle of the seat, with the Duke of Montrose on his left hand, and Lord Murray on his right. Lord Murray was said to have received a violent blow over the right eye, from a splinter of the fractured glass. On alighting from the carriage at St. James's, the Prince Regent apprized Sir Nathaniel Conant, who was in attendance, of the outrageous proceedings which had occurred; and, in consequence of measures which were very promptly taken, the guards at the Palace, the Parks, the Bank, &c. were doubled. A message was immediately sent to the Lord Mayor, informing him of the outrage, and instructing him, should he find it necessary, towards the maintenance of the public peace, to call in the military power, to address himself to the commanding officer of the Tower for that purpose; and dispatches were sent by the mail coaches to every part of the kingdom, to put the magistrates in every place upon their guard. However, by five o'clock in the afternoon, the streets were perfectly clear, and no disposition to riot appeared in any part of the town.

In consequence of Lord Sidmouth's communication, the consideration of the usual address, in the House of Peers, was postponed till the following evening; and, in the Commons, the debate, which had commenced, upon the address, was adjourned. A conference between the two Houses was holden; the result of which was, a joint address to the Prince Regent, on the late atrocious attempt on his life, which was presented to his Royal Highness on the following morning, by 104 Peers, and between 60 and 70 Commoners. A most gracious answer from the Prince was given, and communicated to both Houses in the evening.

A proclamation was issued, offering a reward of 1000*l.* for the apprehension of those persons, and their abettors, by whom the passage of the Prince Regent to the House of Parliament had been notoriously interrupted, and his Royal person endangered. One man was apprehended on suspicion, but the actual offenders were never discovered.

On the ensuing evening (January 29) Earl Grey moved an amendment, on the address in answer to the Royal speech, chiefly for the purpose of expressing an opinion that his Royal Highness was under a delusion respecting the degree, and probable duration, of the pressure on the resources of the country, which was declared to

to be much more extensive in its operations, more severe in its effects, more deep and general in its causes, and more difficult to be removed, than that which had prevailed at the termination of any former war. To this declaration was added, a profession of regret that his Royal Highness should not sooner have been advised to adopt measures of the most rigid economy and retrenchment, particularly with respect to our military establishments; and a resolution that the House should go immediately into a committee on the state of the nation. The amendment, however, was negatived without a division.—A similar amendment, moved in the Commons on the preceding day, was negatived by 264 against 112.

On the 3d of February, a message from the Regent was communicated to both Houses, announcing that his Royal Highness had thought proper to order to be laid before parliament, papers containing an account of certain meetings and combinations held in different parts of the country, tending to the disturbance of the public tranquillity, the alienation of the affections of the people from his Majesty's person and government, and to the overthrow of the whole frame and system of the law and constitution; and his Royal Highness recommended those papers to immediate and serious consideration.

Another communication, of a different and highly gratifying nature, was made to the House of Commons, by Lord Castlereagh, on the 7th of the same month; previously to his moving for the appointment of a Committee of Enquiry respecting the income and expenditure of the state. His lordship stated, that he had it in command from his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, to announce, that, sympathising with the sufferings of a generous people, he had determined upon a cession of 50,000*l. per annum* of that part of his income which related to his personal expenses, during the continuation of the present difficulties. At the same time, his lordship announced the intention of his Majesty's ministers voluntarily to dispense with one-tenth of their official incomes, while the necessities of the state should require such a concession. Lord Camden, one of the tellers of the Exchequer, also relinquished, pro tempore, the whole of the enormous profits of that sinecure office, with the exception of 2,500*l.* the regulated income of the other tellers. This, it was expected, would effect a saving of 16 or 18,000*l.* a year.—On the reduced scale, the expenditure for the year was estimated at 18,373,000*l.*—less, by the sum of 6,500,000*l.* than the expenditure of the preceding year. A further saving of upwards of 1,000,000*l.* was calculated upon for the year 1818.

Notwithstanding the expectation of coercive measures to be adopted by government, a meeting of the populace, headed by Mr. Hunt and his friends, under the ostensible motive of petitioning for parliamentary reform, was held in Spa Fields, on the 10th of February; and a similar meeting, in Palace Yard, Westminster, on the 13th.

On the 18th of the month, the report of the Secret Committee of the House of Lords was presented. This important document commenced by stating, that the Committee, having examined the papers referred to them, had found, from the evidence contained therein, that there was no doubt that treasonable conspiracies had been formed in the metropolis and elsewhere, which had for their object the total overthrow of the laws and government, and the indiscriminate plunder and division of property. As early as August last, different meetings had been held in the metropolis, with a view to promote their objects. Arms were purchased for that purpose, and other measures of the like kind resorted to. At subsequent consultations it was resolved, as the best mode of collecting together a great number of people, to call a public meeting in Spa Fields, which was fixed for the 15th of November. The report next adverted to the inflammatory handbills and advertisements which preceded that meeting, for the purpose of exciting the people to outrage and plunder. After adverting to the first meeting which took place in Spa-fields, it proceeded to detail a variety of circumstances tending to prove the atrocious intentions of the conspirators. Among other facts detailed, were those of their having prepared addresses, and circulated them in the gaols, informing the prisoners they would shortly be liberated, and urging them to hold themselves in readiness for that event, when they would be armed by the provisional government. In these addresses they were also desired to prepare themselves with tri-coloured cockades, emblematic of the approaching revolution. Plans were also formed for an attack upon the Tower—pikes were manufactured to arm the people—leaders were appointed to conduct the assaults in different districts, and fire arms were distributed amongst those who were considered most worthy of confidence. While these arrangements were formed, the leaders of the conspiracy were found, night after night, in public houses, working up the minds of the people whom they might meet there, so as to render them ready instruments to execute any project, however desperate. Exertions were also made to win over the soldiers to their cause. Tri-coloured flags were prepared, together with a banner, on which was inscribed the words, "the brave soldiers are our friends, treat them kindly;" and it appeared that, down to the 2d of December, they had the fullest confidence of success. It further appeared, that communications regularly took place between the conspirators in the metropolis, and persons actuated by feelings equally evil in other parts of the country; and that matters were so regulated as that their efforts should be devoted to the same purpose in different quarters at the same time. For which purpose, it was agreed that they should all hold meetings on the same day, and thereby effect a general rising at once; and this was to be done under the pretence that they were to petition the Prince Regent, the real object being to promote a spirit of insubordination—a contempt of all laws, whether religious or otherwise—an equal division of all property, and a restoration to what was termed natural rights. The next point upon which the report touched was the existence of societies in various parts of the kingdom, under the titles of Hampden clubs, Spencean philanthropists, &c. the object of which was, under the disguise of constitutional proceedings, to extend the plans of devastation and destruction already described. It disclaimed a general imputation of disloyalty against the members of these clubs; but at the same time remarked on the pernicious use which was made of such cloaks. A reference was then had to the administration of secret oaths, and to the extraordinary measures which were taken by the conspirators to prevent a discovery of their plots—plots which were found to have existence in all the great manufacturing towns throughout the country, Glasgow, Manchester, Birmingham, &c. The last topic alluded to was the publication of inflammatory and seditious works, at a cheap rate; the end and intention of which was to root out all feelings of religion and morality, and to excite hatred and contempt for the existing state of things. The Committee, in fine, attributed the late attack upon the Prince Regent to the effect produced by those publications, and expressed it as their decided opinion, that the civil power, as at present constituted, under all the circumstances stated, was insufficient for the preservation of the public peace. On the following evening, a report, similar in object and effect, was presented from the Secret Committee of the House of Commons.

In consequence of the circumstances discovered by the Secret Committees of parliament, four persons, of the names of Watson, Preston, Hooper, and Keene, were apprehended and committed to the Tower on a charge of high treason. A reward of 500*l.* was also offered for the apprehension of a man of the name of Thistlewood; and a further reward of 500*l.* for the apprehension of the junior Watson. The metropolis, indeed, as well as several other parts of the kingdom, was for some time in a state of great alarm.

The first parliamentary consequence of the reports of the Secret Committees was a motion by Lord Sidmouth, in the upper House, for the suspension of the habeas corpus Act, until the 1st of July then next ensuing. A bill to this effect was read the first time on the 21st of February; on the 24th it was read a second and third time, passed, and ordered to the Commons; where where, on the 26th, it was read a first time, on the 27th a second time, on the 28th a third time; and, on the 4th of March, it received the royal assent. This measure was carried by a great majority in the Lords, but not without strong opposition from several eminent noblemen; eighteen of whom entered a formal protest against the Bill, on the ground that the report of the Secret Committee had not stated such a case of imminent and pressing danger as might not be provided against by the existing laws, of one which warranted the suspension of the most important security to the liberty of the country.

In addition to the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, Lord Castlereagh, in the House of Commons, gave notice of farther measures for the protection of the country against the machinations of the disaffected. These were, first, the extending of the Act of 1795, for the security of his Majesty's person, to that of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent; secondly, the embodying into one Act, the provisions of the Act of 1795 relative to tumultuous meetings and debating societies, and the provisions of the Act of the 39th of the King, which declared the illegality of all societies bound together by secret oaths, and of such as extended themselves by fraternized branches over the kingdom; and, lastly, the making of enactments to punish with the utmost rigour any attempt to gain over soldiers or sailors to act with any association or set of men, or to withdraw them from their allegiance. Numerous petitions against these proposed restrictions on public liberty, particularly against the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, were presented to Parliament; and, in the respective Houses, they were opposed, in every stage of their rapid progress, by such members as usually stood forward to advocate the privileges of the people.

In the course of this session of parliament, several unsuccessful attempts were made, by the members of the opposition, to lessen the expences of government, by the abolition of unnecessary offices, and the reduction of enormous salaries. Mr. Grattan's annual motion, in favour of the Irish Catholics, was defeated by a majority of 24; and Lord Donoughmore's corresponding motion, in the Upper House, was negatived by 142 votes against 90.

At the latter end of May, the office of Speaker of the House of Commons was resigned, on account of illness, by Mr. Abbot, on whom the Prince Regent immediately conferred the title of Baron Colchester. The Right Hon. Charles Manners Sutton was elected to succeed him, as Speaker.

On the assembling of the Peers, after the Easter recess, it was ordered, on the motion of Earl Grey, that a copy of the circular letter, which had then recently been addressed by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, to the lords-lieutenant of counties, relative to seditious or blasphemous publications, be laid before the House. In this document, Lord Sidmouth had stated, that, as it was of the greatest importance to prevent, if possible, the circulation of the blasphemous and seditious pamphlets and writings then distributed in great numbers through the country, he had thought it is duty to consult the law officers of the crown, whether a person found selling, or in any other way publishing, such writings, might be brought immediately before a justice of the peace, by warrant, to answer for his conduct; and that the law officers, after consideration, had notified to him their opinion, that a justice of the peace might issue his warrant for the apprehension of a person charged before him, on oath, with the publication of such libels, and compel him to give bail to answer the charge. Under these circumstances, his lordship desired to call the attention of the lords-lieutenant particularly to the subject, and requested that they would notify such opinion to the chairman at the quarter sessions, in order that magistrates might act upon it. Subsequently to the production of this circular, Lord Grey introduced the subject to the Peers, in a speech replete with legal information, in which he contended against the principle, that a Justice of the Peace might be called upon by any common informer to decide what was or was not a libel, and to commit or hold to bail, upon his sole judgment, the party accused. His lordship further held that such a specific intimation to Magistrates, as to the mode in which they were to construe the law, even supposing the law itself to be clear and undisputed, would have been a high offence against the constitution.—Earl Grey's motion, which was for the production of the case which had been submitted to the law officers of the crown, on whose opinion Lord Sidmouth's circular to the magistrates had been issued, was supported by the Lords Erskine and Holland, and opposed by the Lords Ellenborough and Eldon. On a division, it was negatived by 75 against 19.—The subject was introduced into the House of Commons by Sir Samuel Romilly, who strongly animadverted upon the tyranny and oppression to which this unwarranted interpretation of the law, as he conceived it to be, would open a door. He enlarged also upon the dangerous authority assumed in this instance by an officer of the crown. By the accustomed majority of the House, however, Sir Samuel's motion failed of its object.

The country continuing to be in an alarming state, messages from the Prince Regent were sent down to both Houses on the 3d of June; stating, that his Royal Highness had ordered to be laid before parliament papers containing information of practices, meetings, and combinations, carried on in different parts of the kingdom, tending to disturb the public peace and tranquillity, and to endanger the constitution of these realms; and recommending to parliament to take the same into its immediate consideration. The papers produced were accordingly referred, as in a former case, to Committees of Secresy. The report of the Lords' Committee, presented on the 12th of June, stated, in substance, that the Committee having taken into their consideration the subject of the papers communicated to them, and fully considered the testimonial statements on which the communications were founded, had resolved, as their opinion, that the spirit of tumult and insurrection which gave rise to the Bill now in operation, for suspending the Habeas Corpus, had by no means subsided; that the same spirit was still active; and that it was only by the vigilance of the magistrates, aided by the operation of the present Bill, and their communications with the government, that the spirit of tumult and rebellion was kept down; that active preparations were still going on in several parts of the country amongst the lowest orders, in manufacturing districts, with a view to subvert the constitution of this country, and that the revival of the said Bill for six months longer was absolutely necessary, to secure the public peace. The report from the Committee of the House of Commons was not presented till eight days afterwards. That document, which was of considerable length, traced the history of several plots from certain proceedings at Manchester, in the month of March, to others in Derbyshire, on the 9th of June; concluding in the following words:—"Confidently as they (the Committee) rely on the loyalty and good disposition of the great body of his Majesty's subjects (even in those parts of the country in which the spirit of disaffection has shown itself in the most formidable shape) they cannot but express their conviction, that it is not yet safe to rely entirely, for the preservation of the public tranquillity, upon the ordinary powers of the law." It was admitted, in the reports, that the evidence laid before the Committees had, in a great measure, been derived from the dispositions and communications of persons who were more or less implicated in the criminal transactions under consideration, or who had apparently engaged in them with a view of giving information to government. The evidence of both of these classes of persons, it was observed, must be regarded with a degree of suspicion; and that there was reason to apprehend, that the language and conduct of some of the latter might, in certain instances, have had the effect of encouraging designs which it was intended they should only be the instruments of detecting. Many warm, animated, and even acrimonious debates ensued; in the course of which, ministers defended, and most strenuously insisted upon, such an employment of spies as had had been alluded to in the reports of the Secret Committees; and the consequence of the new alarm that had been excited was, that parliament voted a further suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, till the 1st of March, in the ensuing year.

To the honour of the legislature, it is recorded, that, on the 9th of July, Mr. Wilberforce's motion, for an address to the Prince Regent, most humbly submitting to his Royal Highness, in the most dutiful but urgent terms, the expression of our continued and unceasing solicitude for the universal and final abolition of the African slave trade amongst the European powers, was agreed to without a dissentient voice.

On the same evening that Mr. Wilberforce's motion was so happily disposed of, a discussion of considerable interest took place in the House of Commons, upon a series of resolutions on finance, which had been brought forward by Mr. Tierney. In opposing those resolutions, the Chancellor of the Exchequer contended, that, as Mr. Tierney's resolutions "were well founded, they only went to prove the propriety of the financial plan upon which he (Mr. Vansittart) was not allowed to proceed. If that system (the Income Tax) had been acted upon, it would have produced a considerable discharge of the national incumbrances, and he could not, therefore, upon the whole, help regretting that that system was not adopted. If the encouraging prospects now opening should unhappily fail, he was decidedly of opinion, that vigorous measures ought to be adopted for the improvement of our financial situation; but he hoped the state of the country would not require it. That, amidst all our difficulties, such an improvement as existed should have taken place in the funds, was considered extraordinary; but the present session of parliament had dispelled for ever the suggestions of a system of innovation and bad faith, which, for a time, united with other circumstances of the country, to lower public credit. He now trusted that public credit would still further rise, though at that moment the country was not actually paying more than 3 per cent. interest on the Exchequer Bills. Doubts had been expressed as to the expectations held out by the Bank; but nothing less than an extraordinary political or commercial shock would prevent the resumption of cash payments in July next. The national prospect was improved by the hope of an abundant harvest, not merely in this country but throughout the continent, and he thought we might reasonably look to a more extensive and productive commercial intercourse." After a debate of considerable length, the previous question was severally put and carried upon each of Mr. Tierney's resolutions; and the counter-resolutions of Mr. C. Grant were put and carried in their stead..

The last important debate of the session, was that which took place in the House of Commons on Mr. Brougham's motion for an enquiry into the state of the nation; a motion which appeared to be introduced, not with any expectation of its being carried, but for the sake of an opportunity of enabling the honourable mover, as the organ of opposition in the lower house, to enter a protest, in detail, against the whole of the acts and proceedings of ministers. Lord Castlereagh, in reply, entered into a defence of himself and of his colleagues; and, ultimately, the motion was negatived without a division.

The prorogation of parliament, by a speech from the throne, took place on the 12th of July. His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, in his speech upon this occasion, expressed deep regret for the continued indisposition of his Majesty; glanced at the respective subjects which had passed under the consideration of parliament; and noticed the prospect of an abundant harvest, not only in this country, but throughout a considerable part of the continent; from which, and other circumstances, he anticipated an improvement in the commercial relations of this and all other countries.

The early disturbances at Manchester, alluded to in the last mentioned report of the Secret Committee of the House of Commons, appear to have been of a very extraordinary description. At a public meeting, held near St. Peter's church, Manchester, on the 3d of March, by persons denominating themselves friends of parliamentary reform, notices were issued, that the espousers of their doctrines should assemble at the same place on the 10th of the month, and proceed thence to the metropolis, to present a petition to the Prince Regent, that they might be enabled to "undeceive him!" Aware of these intentions, and of the dangers, which an immense influx of strangers, irritated by the inflammatory appeals of their factious leaders (who, under the pretence of promoting parliamentary reform, had been for a length of time past agitating the minds of the labouring part of society) portended, the conservators of the public tranquillity took every precaution adequate to the occasion. Accordingly, at the time appointed, crowds of people flocked into the town, from all directions, as early as eight o'clock in the morning, and at about nine, the instigators appeared, on their temporary stage in a cart, and continued to harangue the multitude, till their vast increasing numbers suggested the expediency of putting into practice the well-formed arrangements of the civil and military powers. A party of the first regiment of dragoons, under Colonel Teesdale, accompanied by the magistrates of the district, then appeared amongst them, and, with an adroitness and decision almost electrical, surrounded the erection, and immediately conveyed the entire group upon it to the New Bailey prison. Their attention was next directed to the concourse of auditors, who were forthwith dispersed without the infliction of any severity.—Johnson and Ogden, two of the leaders upon former occasions, had been arrested on the previous morning, and were secured in the New Bailey. Others were seized by the soldiers on their way to deliver their charge in Salford. A considerable number of people set out on their mission to London, taking the route of Stockport, but above forty of them were reconducted to Manchester, and added to their other unfortunate companions; others were furnished with secure accommodations in Stockport. Most of them were provided with knapsacks, &c. containing blankets and other articles. Upon the examination of some of these travelling equipages, two unusually large knives were discovered. At one period there was an assemblage of at least 30,000 people at the meeting; and it was supposed that the arrivals at Manchester, in the course of the day, were not fewer than from 60 to 70,000 individuals. Not more, however, than 500 out of the many thousands assembled in the morning penetrated so far as Macclesfield, where a troop of the yeomanry had remained to provide against such a contingency; and no more than twenty persons proceeded from Macclesfield into Staffordshire, the adjoining county. Nothing could be more wretched and pitiable than the appearance of the few who reached Macclesfield; some actually fainting through weariness, and all of them without baggage or any apparent resource with which to proceed twenty miles further towards London. Thus ended, what has since been known under the quaint appellation of the Blanketeering Expedition.

In the month of June, the senior Watson was, with Thistlewood and some others, put upon his trial, on a charge of high treason, in the Court of King's Bench, but acquitted.* In the course of the summer, the turbulent

* The cause was entitled, The King, v. Arthur Thistlewood, James Watson the Elder, Thomas Preston, and John Hooper: it began in the Court of King's Bench, on Monday, June 9, and occupied the Court and Jury seven complete days. The only person put on his trial was James Watson the Elder, the others being in Court, but placed behind the accused. The indictment charged the crime of high treason, in four distinct charges:—1. That of compassing and imagining the death of the King. 2. That of conspiring to deprive him of his royal state and government. 3. The actual levying of war against the King. 4. Conspiring to oblige the King to change the measures and acts of his government by force.

The witnesses proved the facts laid in the indictment, as the assembling of the mob—the tri-coloured flag—the inscriptions on it—the arrival of the waggon—the infuriated speeches from the waggon—the violence of the younger Watson, who, after challenging the mob to follow him, jumped down from the waggon, and proceeded at the head of a considerable body down Coppice-row, into the city, intending to attack the Bank, and to summon or enter the Tower.

turbulent disposition of the manufacturing classes having exhibited itself in several of the northern and midland counties, particularly in those of Derby, Nottingham, York, and Lancaster, in many atrocious acts of tumult and outrage, it was found expedient to appoint a special commission to sit at Derby, for the trial of the offenders. The first four prisoners were found guilty; nineteen of the others were then allowed to withdraw their former plea of not guilty, and to plead guilty, on an understanding that mercy would be extended to them; and twelve were acquitted, the Attorney-General having declined to call evidence against them. Sentence of death was formally pronounced upon twenty-three of these deluded men; but only three of them—Brandreth, Ludlam, and Turner—suffered the full penalty of the law.

The latter part of the year 1817 was marked by an event of a most calamitous nature; an event that filled the whole land with mourning. The Princess Charlotte of Wales, whose nuptials had, in the preceding year, afforded so much satisfaction to the country, was in a situation likely to afford an eventual heir to the British throne. Seldom, perhaps, had the hopes and wishes of a whole people been so deeply interested on a similar occasion. At nine o'clock, however, on the night of the 5th of November, her Royal Highness was delivered of a still-born male child; and about half-past twelve, she was seized with great difficulty of breathing, restlessness, and exhaustion, which alarming symptoms increased till half-past two on the morning of the 6th, when her Royal Highness expired, to the inexpressible grief of the Prince Regent, of her illustrious consort the Prince Leopold, of the whole Royal family, and indeed of the nation at large. The succinct details of this misfortune are thus affectingly related, in a letter, which bears the stamp of authenticity, dated from Claremont, the scene of distress, at six o'clock on the morning of Thursday, November the 6th:—

"On Monday in the night, or about three on Tuesday morning, her Royal Highness was taken ill, and expresses were sent off to the great officers of state, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of London, desiring their immediate attendance. Earl Bathurst, Lord Sidmouth, the Lord Chancellor, Mr. Vansittart, together with the Archbishop and Bishop, immediately attended. Dr. Baillie, and Dr. Croft were the medical attendants. During the whole of Monday, the labour advanced slowly, but without the least appearance of danger. The Princess Charlotte showed uncommon firmness, and the utmost resignation. Towards evening, as the labour still lingered, it was deemed advisable to send for Dr. Sims, who arrived in the middle of the night. Nothing could be going on better, though too slowly; and the excellent constitution of the Princess gave every assurance that she would not be too much exhausted by the delay. No language, no panegyric, can be too warm for the manner in which the Prince Leopold conducted himself. He was incessant in his attendance, and no countenance could more deeply express the anxiety he felt. Once or twice, he exclaimed, to the medical attendants, 'that the unrepining patient endurance of the Princess, whilst it gave him comfort, communicated also a deep affliction at her sufferings being so lengthened.'—About six o'clock yesterday, the labour advanced more rapidly, and no apprehensions were entertained of any fatal result; and the child was ascertained to be living. At nine o'clock, her Royal Highness was delivered of a male child, but still-born. Throughout the whole of this long and painful labour, her Royal Highness evinced the greatest firmness, and received the communication of the child being born dead with great resignation. Prince Leopold exclaimed to the medical attendants, as soon as the intelligence was communicated to him—'Thank God! thank heaven! the Princess is safe.' The child was perfect, and one of the finest infants ever brought into the world. The Princess was composed, after her delivery, and though of course much exhausted, every hope was entertained of her doing well. This pleasing intelligence being communicated to the great officers of state, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of London, they left Claremont about eleven o'clock, the medical attendants of course remaining. A little after twelve, a change was observed in her Royal Highness—her quiet left her—she became restless and uneasy—and the medical attendants felt alarmed. Expresses

The elder Watson followed, with another body of the mob. It is probable that the occurrences at Mr. Beckwith's shop deranged young Watson's intentions: as they certainly caused him to lose time. The mob, after plundering Mr. Beckwith's shop of arms, proceeded to the Royal Exchange, and to the Minories, where they plundered two other gunsmiths' shops. They had also among them some pikes. One of the flags was taken away from the mob by a police officer. Mr. Platt, who had been wounded at Beckwith's, was sufficiently recovered to give his evidence; which, however, did not affect Watson the elder. The principal evidence was Castles, an accomplice, a man of bad character, who described many actions, and preparations for other actions, to which he himself was a party.—He detailed many excursions to view the soldiers' barracks—to seduce soldiers—a visit to the Tower, for the same purpose—the making of pikes (which was corroborated by Isaac Bentley, the man employed to make them). It was also proved, that Watson promoted these doings; and changed his lodgings for the greater privacy, and convenience of carrying on the design.

The counsel for the prisoners, Mr. Wetherell, in a speech which occupied six hours in the delivery, commented on the evidence brought forward in support of the prosecution; especially on that of Castles, an indescribable villain, the portrait of whose mind no language could draw. The learned counsel contended, that if all the circumstances detailed in evidence were true, yet the offence of which the prisoner had been guilty, did not amount to high treason; it was at the utmost only rioting; and under the Riot Act, should the prisoners have been tried. In support of this opinion, the learned counsel cited the cases of the Birmingham rioters in 1795, and of the riots in London in 1780. In the first of which, houses had been burnt and destroyed; and in the riots of 1780, Lord G. Gordon, at the head of 40,000, had approached even to the threshold of the House of Commons; prisons were broken open; London was on fire in fourteen or fifteen different places at once: and, in fact, the metropolis was in the possession of rioters for more than a week. Several persons afterwards suffered as rioters, but not one was convicted of high treason.

Several witnesses were examined for the prisoner; among them was Mr. Hunt. Sergeant Copley addressed the Jury on the part of the defence; and commented on the various parts of the evidence.

The Solicitor-General replied, and contended that the breaking open the gunsmiths' shops—the ordering of pikes—the address to the soldiers in the tower—and various other acts, were treason. He called on the Jury to dismiss prejudice from their minds, and consider the evidence on both sides fairly; if in such a consideration they should be of opinion there had been no intention on the part of the prisoner to overturn the government, or to promote rebellious riot, then they would acquit him; if, on the contrary, they should be of opinion there was proof of such an intent; if they wished for the preservation of the administration of the laws; if they desired the security of property and individual security; if they attended to the obligation of their oath, and to the call of the public upon them, they were bound to find the prisoner guilty.

On the seventh day, Lord Ellenborough addressed the Jury, and fully explained the nature of the four charges in the indictment against the prisoner for high treason, and concluded this explanation by saying—"If it should appear, as was contended by the counsel for the prisoner, that the riot in which he was concerned was merely a disturbance, not directed in any way against the regal authority of the realm, I trust no person would ever seek to confound the limits of the two offences, and to mix up a mere riot with treason;—in order to make it treason, it must appear there was a design to overthrow the government of the country. The question, and the only question you have to try, is in reality this:—Whether the conspiracy in which the prisoner was engaged, were or were not a conspiracy to overthrow the government of the country." His lordship then commented upon the observation of the prisoner's counsel, that the counsel for the Crown should have called in the evidence of Harrison and Keards, and stated that this could not have been done by them, but might have been done by the prisoner's counsel. His lordship gave it as his opinion, that the evidence of Castles had been corroborated by several occurrences and by several witnesses; and with regard to the objection made to the evidence of an accomplice, that secret transactions, particularly those of this nature, could not, in many cases, be otherwise brought to light. His lordship concluded a long and eloquent address, in which he was occasionally assisted by Mr. Justice Bayley, by telling the Jury, that, "if they believed the facts stated on the part of the prosecution, it must appear manifest that an object was contemplated, which, if successful, would have involved the country in anarchy and confusion, have overset the existing laws, and shaken every security for the life and property of the subject."

The Jury then retired, and in about two hours brought in a verdict of—Not Guilty.

Thistlewood, Preston, and Hooper, were brought up the next day, and in consequence of the acquittal of Watson, their prosecution was abandoned.

During the trial of Watson, Mr. Stafford, Chief Clerk of the Public Office, Bow-street, brought into Court, a considerable number of papers, with the following inscriptions on them, which, he said, were circulated throughout the Hall:—"Britons be free; a few Bellinghams is wanted."—"Britons arise; no poverty in a free country." were sent off to the officers of state, stating the change that had taken place. From half-past twelve, restlessness and convulsions increased, till nature and life were quite exhausted, and her Royal Highness expiredat half-past two this morning. Prince Leopold was with her Royal Highness at this agonizing moment."

The indications of grief were universal throughout the country, when the death of her Royal Highness was known; and measures were instantly adopted in the City for giving public and official solemnity to the internal feelings. The Lord Mayor summoned an especial meeting of the Court of Aldermen, which took place at Guildhall, when it was unanimously agreed, that the fitting up of Guildhall for the approaching Lord Mayor's day, should be immediately discontinued, and the preparations already made for the purpose removed. Public notice was also directed to be given for abolishing all show and rejoicings on that day. In the more immediate vicinage of Claremont, the symptoms of sorrow were still more strongly marked. The houses of Esher and Kingston, where preparations had been made, on the safe delivery of the Princess, were actually shut up, as if a death had happened, in almost every family there. The Lord Mayor ordered the great bell of St. Paul's to toll, as is customary when any of the Royal Family die. The tradespeople of the Royal Family, by a spontaneous movement, shut up the windows of their shops. Lord Sidmouth also sent to suspend performances at the different theatres, and orders for a general mourning were given. The funeral took place, at Windsor, on Wednesday the 19th of November. All public business was suspended on that day, and all the shops, and many of the private houses, completely closed, not only in London, but in almost every town throughout the united kingdom. Funeral sermons were preached in numerous churches and chapels, and the different congregations were the largest ever known. It was a day of universal mourning, and from the highest to the lowest, every one bore some symbol of grief.* The lamentable demise of her Royal Highness appears to have preyed, with unusual violence, upon the sensitive mind of Sir Richard Croft, the accoucheur by whom she had been attended; as, on the 12th of February following, that unfortunate man perished by his own hand.

A. D. 1818.] It appears to be an inherent principle of the human mind, when the first shock of calamity has been overcome, to endeavour to repair the misfortune, and, as far as may be practicable, to educe good from evil. By the death of the Princess Charlotte, fears were naturally entertained respecting the succession to the Crown.† Accordingly, negociations were in a short

* The Princess Charlotte was born on the 7th of January, 1796, at ten in the morning. To trace her Royal Highness's progress through her various stages of education, would be little more than to recapitulate, that her earliest years were spent under the domestic tuition of her royal mother; that, at a proper period, the Bishop of Exeter, a man of eminent piety, of profound learning, and of amiable manners and disposition, was appointed to the important office of her private tutor, by the parental choice of his Majesty, who, by the customary law of England, as well as by the feudal, is guardian of all infants, and of course more particularly of his grand-daughter, and the heiress presumptive of his crown—that, on being taken from the parental superintendence, Lady de Clifford was selected as her governess, and that this venerable lady, on the advance of her royal pupil to maturity, was superseded by the Duchess Dowager of Leeds. There was no part of her education to which a more exemplary attention was paid, than that of instructing her in the principles of the Christian religion, and instilling into her mind an ardent attachment to the ecclesiastical establishments of this country. Under the Bishop of Exeter, a Rev. Divine, Dr. Nott, acted as a sub-preceptor; and her Royal Highness's accomplishments were not confined to her own language, but extended to a considerable tincture of classical literature. Of this fact, indeed, no doubt can exist, since it was confirmed by the authority of the late Bishop of London; who, in a conversation, which he states to have taken place at her mother's house at Blackheath, reports her not only to have been of the most inquisitive, but of the most intelligent mind; he adds, that he found her extremely well versed in branches of English literature, suited to her age, and that her progress in moral and christian studies far exceeded his expectation. Whilst the more solid and serious pursuits of education were in the course of acquisition, the elegant and refined parts were not overlooked or neglected. Her Royal Highness was an excellent musician. She performed on the harp and piano-forte. Her voice was not powerful, but sweet, and scientifically modulated. She had a most excellent ear, and brilliant execution. Her chief delight, however, was in the poetry of the finest writers in our language. An admirable choice of prose writers was made for her Royal Highness by the Bishop of Exeter.—Her Royal Highness had very little of the vanity of exterior ornament and dress. She never indulged in it, either before or after her marriage. She aimed at little beyond neatness or plainness. There was no incumbering superfluity of jewels to be seen upon her person; in short, nothing which distinguished her from the common gentlewoman, in splendour of apparel.—Always elegant, modest, and refined, and peculiarly chaste and circumspect in her demeanour; she had nothing of high or fashionable life about her, but a lofty and generous sense of the duties which her elevated rank demanded.

Her Royal Highness's first introduction to the Prince of Cobourg was in the summer of 1814, when the Allied Sovereigns of Europe visited this country upon the occasion of the general peace. She was captivated with his address and manners; a familiar intercourse improved these first impressions into a warmer sentiment, and love succeeded to esteem. The Duke of York, who first observed this growing attachment, communicated it to the Prince Regent, and a formal proposal was soon made through his Royal Highness to the Prince Cobourg himself. The marriage took place on the 2d of May, 1816. His Royal Highness was requested to accept the rank or title of a British Dukedom: the extinct Dukedom of Kendal was to be revived for his acceptance. He is supposed to have refused it at the desire of the Princess Charlotte, wishing to derive no rank but by his marriage with her. Both concurred in their preference of a country life, and Claremont and its neighbourhood were daily adorned by their taste in landscape, and rural improvement.

Upon the marriage of her Royal Highness with the Prince of Cobourg, the provision voted for them by Parliament was suitable to the generosity of a great nation. An income of 50,000*l.* per annum was settled upon them jointly, and for the life of the survivor; the Prince, therefore, continues to enjoy this splendid annuity during his life. A separate income of 10,000*l.* per annum, independent of the controul of her husband, was settled on the Princess Charlotte. Sixty thousand pounds was voted to them as an outfit; and Claremont was purchased for their residence. This seat is, of course, now the property of her husband.

Her Royal Highness was about the middle size, inclining rather to the en-bon-point, but not so much so as to impair the symmetry of her form. Her complexion was beautifully fair, her arms delicately rounded, and her head finely placed. There was a mingled sweetness and dignity in her look, a full intelligent eye; and when she was engaged in conversation, particularly in familiar conversation, much liveliness in the expression of her countenance. One of her most pleasing occupations was to accompany her illustrious Consort in his study of the English language, in which he was so diligent as soon to be able to read our best writers upon history and jurisprudence. She was of religious habits, and a strict observer of the sabbath, as well as her husband, who always read to her, after the church service, one of our best English sermons. She was a most affectionate child; and, as a wife, was a model for her sex. She looked up to her husband with the most perfect affection and respect; and he deserved it all. His influence over her was unbounded, though the exercise of it was of the gentlest kind—the lenis dominatio.

† It is well known to every reader of English history, that, towards the end of the reign of William III., upon the impending extinction of the protestant posterity of Charles I., it became necessary to have recourse to the descendants of James I. the father of that prince. The throne, upon the accession of King William, being limited to Protestants, the Princess Sophia, Electress, and Duchess Dowager of Hanover, was fixed upon as the root of a royal stock. The Princess Sophia was the youngest daughter of Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia, who was the daughter of James I. This Princess was the nearest of the ancient blood royal, who was not incapacitated by professing the Popish religion. On her, therefore, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants, the remainder of the Crown, expectant on the death of King William and Queen Anne, without issue, was settled by 12 and 13 William III. She is the common ancestor through whom alone the Crown of Great Britain can descend. This is the last limitation made by act of parliament. The Princess Sophia dying before Queen Anne, the inheritance thus descended on her son and heir, King George I. And having, on the death of Queen Anne, taken effect in his person, from George I. it descended to George II.; from George II. to his grandson and heir, his late Majesty George III; and from George III. to his son and heir, our present gracious Monarch, George IV.

At the death of the Princess Charlotte, the following was a list of all the descendants then living of the Electress Sophia, to whose issue, being Protestants, the succession is limited; they are arranged in the legal order of succession; annexed are their respective ages; and the relationship of each to the branch through which they derived their title, as marked by letters signifying son, grandson, great grandson, daughter, grand-daughter, &c.: as some individuals derive by more than one title, they are enumerated as often as their rights occur, a reference being made to their former place. A few alterations are since believed to have taken place, by death; and some others by the recent marriages of the Royal Dukes.

time entered into for the marriage of some of the younger sons of his Majesty. The parliament was opened by commission on Tuesday, the 27th of January. The royal speech was calculated to allay the apprehensions of tumult and conspiracy which had been long entertained, and to inspire confidence in the resources of the country. Its principal topics were—the continued indisposition of his Majesty; the lamented death of the Princess Charlotte; an intimation that the Prince Regent had not been unmindful of the effect which that sad event must have had on the interests and future prospects of the kingdom; an assurance of the continued friendly disposition of foreign powers; the improved state of industry and public credit; the restored tranquillity of the country; the treaties with Spain and Portugal on the abolition of the slave trade; a recommendation for increasing the number of places of public worship, &c. An address, with very little discussion, was agreed to, in each house, without a division. Sir Samuel Romilly, however, in opposing the address in answer to the royal speech, severely reprobated the conduct of ministers under the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, remarking that, in the case of Brandreth, the chief of the Derby insurgents, they had not availed themselves of it to prevent the mischief which had been threatened, by apprehending and putting him in confinement, but had allowed him to go on to the perpetration of the capital crime for which his life was ultimately exacted as the forfeit. Sir Samuel observed, also, that a large portion of the evidence which had been produced before the secret committee, went to prove the existence of a conspiracy of the most atrocious kind in the town of Manchester, for which some persons were alledged to be in custody. The trials of those persons had been removed, by certiorari, to the Court of King's Bench, purposely, as he contended, to delay their being brought forward; and the whole of the prisoners had been dismissed for the want of the production of evidence against them. This, the learned gentleman insisted, was a very improper exercise of lenity, if it were true that those men had conspired to burn factories, to attack barracks, and to produce a revolution. Lord Castlereagh, in reply to the observations of Sir Samuel Romilly, Lord Folkestone, &c. observed that the doctrine which had been held respecting the trials at Derby, and the assertions that Oliver the spy was intimately connected with those transactions, were pregnant with evil, and did not rest on any foundation. There was not a scintilla of evidence apparent on the trial, that Oliver was ever connected, in any way, with those transactions. The noble lord then entered into a defence of the conduct of his majesty's ministers, and said he should in all probability be authorised, at a very early day, to make a communication to the house on the subject of the state of the country, and to lay before parliament such evidence as would prove government not unworthy of the confidence of the public; and, further, that the present tranquil state of the country was entirely owing to the measures which parliament had adopted during the last session.

In the Upper House, the motion of Lord Sidmouth, for the repeal of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, also called forth some strong remarks from Lord Holland, respecting the partial and suspicious nature of the evidence on which that important right had been suspended, and the pernicious precedent thus established, in a time of profound peace, when nothing whatever had appeared in the state of the country to justify such a proceeding. The Bill for the immediate repeal of the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act was introduced in the House of Peers on the 28th of January, the day after the opening of parliament, and passed through all its stages: the same bill was passed through the House of Commons on the 29th; returned to the Lords, without amendment; and, on the 31st, it received the royal assent.

On the 4th of February, Lord Castlereagh, by the command of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, brought down to the House of Commons a bag of papers, respecting the internal state of the country, for the examination of which his lordship proposed that a select committee should be appointed. As this was understood to be a step, preliminary to a general Bill of Indemnity for all acts performed under the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, by which the persons then imprisoned, and since liberated without trial, would be deprived of all legal remedy for such imprisonment, however unmerited, the appointment of a secret or select committee was strenuously resisted by the members of opposition, who contended, that a very different sort of enquiry was called for by the conduct of ministers. The green bag and its contents formed the subject of much keen sarcasm by the opponents of ministry; notwithstanding which, the appointment of a select committee was agreed to. For the same purpose, a select committee was also appointed in the Upper House. At this period, and for some time afterwards, numerous petitions were presented to parliament, by persons who had been imprisoned under the late Suspension of the Habeas Corpus law, praying for redress, and that no act of indemnity might be passed in favour of ministers. On the 23d of February, however, the report of the secret committee of the House of Lords was presented; and, on the 25th, a Bill of Indemnity, founded on that report, was brought in by the Duke of Montrose. On the motion of its second reading, on the 27th, the Marquis of Lansdowne proposed, as an amendment, that the second reading should be postponed for a fortnight, in order to give time for all the petitions from persons recently imprisoned, under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, to be brought up. This amendment was lost, on a division, by 100 against 83. Its third reading, on the 5th of March, was carried by 93 against 27, on a proposed amendment, the object of which was to get rid of the Bill. When introduced to the House of Commons, by the Attorney-General, on the 9th of March, it called forth the powers of several able speakers, by whom it was opposed in all its stages. Sir Samuel Romilly observed, that it was improperly called a Bill of Indemnity: the object of indemnity was only to protect individuals against public prosecution, without interfering with the rights of private men; but the object of this was to annihilate such rights,—to take away all legal remedies from those who had suffered an illegal and arbitrary exercise of authority, and to punish those who presumed to have recourse to such remedies, by subjecting them to the payment of double costs. He strongly pointed out the ill effects of the protection which it was meant to extend towards magistrates, in any acts of oppression which they might suppose agreeable to ministers, and to the profligate persons who had been employed as spies and informers. Mr. Lambton's motion, that the Bill be read a third time that day six months, was negatived, on a division, by 190 against 64. The second reading was carried the next day, on a division, by 89 against 24. On the 13th of the month, the Bill passed; and, on the 17th, it received the royal assent.

Previously to the adjournment, the treaty between Spain and Great Britain, respecting the African slave trade, received the sanction of parliament, by which Spain, in consideration of a subsidy of 400,000*l.* consented to the abolition of that inhuman traffic on all the coasts to the north of the line, retaining for herself, however, a right of continuing it indefinitely to the south of that limit. On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a resolution was passed for the grant of 1,000,000*l.* in exchequer bills, to be applied to the building of new churches and chapels in places where the increase of inhabitants had rendered such farther accommodation requisite.

On Monday, the 13th of April, subsequently to the Easter recess, messages from the Prince Regent to both houses of parliament, announced the approaching marriages of his Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence to the Princess of Saxe Meiningen, and of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge to the Princess of Hesse. From the discussion which ensued in the Commons, it appeared that the plan which ministers had in contemplation to propose, had previously been submitted to their parliamentary friends, at a meeting holden for that purpose, at the Earl of Liverpool's. The proposition was said to have received a very cold reception, and several gentlemen who had been at the meeting, now declared that they could not accede to its terms. Mr. Brougham proposed an amendment to the address, which amendment was sustained by what was termed "the alarming minority" of 93 against 144. The address, of course, was carried, and the message was ordered to be taken into consideration on the following evening. On the following evening, however, contrary to all precedent on such occasions, the proceedings were postponed till Wednesday! In a very warm conversation which took place on the subject, Mr. Tierney stated it to be the intention of ministers to propose an annual addition of 19,000*l.* or 20,000*l.* to the income of the Duke of Clarence, and of 12,000*l.* respectively to the Dukes of Kent, Cumberland, and Cambridge; with an outfit to each to the amount of the additional income.—On Wednesday, the 15th, Lord Castlereagh, admitting Mr. Tierney's statement to have been substantially correct, informed the house that the intended proposition had been modified; but that nothing less, in addition to the Duke of Clarence's income, than 10,000*l.* could possibly enable him to support the dignity of his rank in the married state. His lordship accordingly moved a resolution, for a grant to that amount. An amendment, however, was moved, making the additional sum 6,000*l.* instead of 10,000*l*; and the amendment was carried, on a division, by 193 against 184—giving a majority of nine against the ministers! On the Tuesday evening following, having announced that the Duke of Clarence could not accept of the 6,000*l.* as it was inadequate to enable him to support the dignity of his rank, in a marriage state, Lord Castlereagh moved a resolution for a grant of an additional income of 6,000*l.* a year to the Duke of Cambridge. This motion was strongly opposed by Mr. Brougham, but ultimately carried.

A few days previously to these discussions, her Royal Highness the Princess Elizabeth had been united to the Prince of Hesse Homberg; but, as she was in the enjoyment of 9,000*l.* a year, settled on her by the state, no proposal whatever was made for a marriage dowry. For a time, the Duke of Clarence, in consequence of the pecuniary disappointment to which he had been subjected by parliament, relinquished, or professed to have relinquished his intended marriage. At a subsequent period, period, however, the union took place. In the ensuing month (May 14) an announcement of the intended marriage of his Royal Highness the Duke of Kent with the Dowager Princess of Leiningen, sister of Prince Leopold of Saxe Cobourg, produced a grant to the royal pair to the same amount as in the cases of the Dukes of Cumberland and Cambridge.

The supplies of this year were estimated at the sum of 20,952,400*l.*; to meet which, in addition to the produce of ways and means, a 3½ per cent. stock was created to the amount of 14,000,000*l.* By this expedient, no new taxes were levied, nor were any additions made to the old ones.

After a comparatively unimportant session, parliament was dissolved by his Royal Highness the Prince Regent in person, on Wednesday, the 10th of June. His Royal Highness entered the House of Lords about two o'clock, in the uniform of a field marshal, attended by the great officers of his household. On his entrance, the curiosity of the ladies seemed to acknowledge no restraint. They actually, as if with one consent, clambered on the benches, where they stood during the entire ceremony. The House of Commons having been summoned to attend his Royal Highness, the speaker, accompanied by several members, entered, and with the usual forms, approached the bar. The right honourable gentleman held in his hand a Bill of Supply, and, addressing the Prince Regent, said, that the House of Commons had attended his Royal Highness in pursuance of his commands, in the hope that their exertions in promoting the good order and happiness of the country, would meet his approbation. They had, during the session, the satisfaction to observe, that the measures they had pursued under his Royal Highness's direction, had effectually maintained the general tranquillity; that the difficulties under which the country had laboured were vanishing, and that the revenue, in its most important branches, was most progressively improving. They had particularly directed their attention, under the recommendation contained in his Royal Highness's speech from the throne, to the necessity of increasing the places for public worship of the established church, and for this purpose their grants were large and liberal. They had also manifested the utmost readiness to enable his Royal Highness to carry into effect the arrangements which had been concluded with the Courts of Spain and Portugal, for the more complete suppression of the slave trade.

The following is the concluding passage of his Royal Highness's speech:—"On closing this session, I think it proper to inform you, that it is my intention forthwith to dissolve the present, and to give directions for calling a new, parliament. In making this communication, I cannot refrain from adverting to the important change which has occurred in the situation of this country, and of all Europe, since I first met you in this place. At that period, the dominion of the common enemy had been so widely extended over the continent, that resistance to his power was by many deemed to be hopeless; and, in the extremities of Europe alone, was such resistance effectually maintained. By the unexampled exertions which you enabled me to make, in aid of countries nobly contending for independence, and by the spirit which was kindled in so many nations, the continent was at length delivered from the most galling and oppressive tyranny under which it had ever laboured; and I had the happiness, by the blessing of Divine Providence, to terminate, in conjunction with his majesty's allies, the most eventful and sanguinary contest in which Europe had for centuries been engaged, with unparalleled success and glory. The prosecution of such a contest for so many years, and more particularly the efforts which marked the close of it, have been followed within our own country, as well as throughout the rest of Europe, by considerable internal difficulties and distress. But deeply as I felt for the immediate pressure upon his majesty's people, nevertheless I looked forward without dismay, having always the fullest confidence in the solidity of the resources of the British empire, and in the relief which might be expected from a continuance of peace, and from the patience, public spirit, and energy of the nation. These expectations have not been disappointed. The improvement in the internal circumstances of the country is happily manifest, and promises to be steadily progressive; and I feel a perfect assurance, that the continued loyalty and exertions of all classes of his majesty's subjects, will confirm these growing indications of national prosperity, by promoting obedience to the laws, and attachment to the constitution, from which all our blessings have been derived."

On the 4th of November, in this year, the following important notification was addressed to the Duke of Richelieu, the prime minister of France, by the plenipotentiaries of the Courts of Great Britain, Russia, Austria, and Prussia:—"That their august masters, being called upon by the 20th Article of the Treaty of Paris, to examine, in concert with the King of France, whether the military occupation of a part of the French territory, stipulated by that treaty, ought to cease at the termination of the third year, or be prolonged to that of the fifth, had recognised with satisfaction, that the order of things established by the restoration of the legitimate and constitutional monarchy of that country, gave assurance of the consolidation of that state of tranquillity in France necessary for the repose of Europe; and that in consequence, they had commanded the immediate discontinuance of such military occupation:—a measure which they regarded as the completion of the general peace." This information was received with extacy and delight by the French people; and, although some slight ebullitions of seditious feeling have since occasionally presented themselves, the event has happily proved, that the presence of foreign troops was no longer necessary to the safety of the Bourbon dynasty.

Throughout the summer, the cotton-spinners and other labouring classes of manufacturers at Manchester, and in the neighbouring parts of the country, remained in a state of organized opposition to their masters on the subject of wages. From this cause several partial disturbances arose; one in particular at Burnley, and another at Stockport. Fortunately, through the prompt exertions of the Manchester yeomanry, these irruptions were put down, without bloodshed or actual violence. It is too probable, however, that much hostility and bitterness of feeling were thus mutually excited between the lower classes and the yeomanry, the effects of which burst forth with calamitous fury at a subsequent period.

In consequence of the Queen's declining health, two amendments had been made in the Regency Bill, during the last session of parliament. The first of these amendments empowered her majesty to add six new members, resident at Windsor, to her council in the event of her absence from that residence; and the second repealed the clause which rendered necessary the immediate assembling of a new parliament in the event of the Queen's death. These amendments were very opportunely made; as, after a lingering decline, attended by much suffering, which was sustained with great fortitude and resignation, her Majesty Queen Charlotte expired at Kew Palace, on the 17th of November, in the seventy-fifth year of her age. Her Majesty had been blest by nature with a sound and vigorous frame: until within two years of her decease, she enjoyed an almost uninterrupted state of health; and, as is sometimes the case with those whose habits are regular, and whose various bodily powers are consequently exposed to a tolerably equal pressure, the first very serious attack of disease was that which indicated a general breaking up of her constitution. Water accumulated in her limbs, and on her chest, until, notwithstanding the relief which medical aid from time to time procured for her, it became an unequivocal symptom of the deadly stage at which her Majesty's sufferings had arrived. For some weeks previously to her death, that event had been almost hourly expected. In the afternoon of Saturday, November the 14th, the royal sufferer experienced a temporary relief, by a small rupture of the skin, on one of her ancles, from which a considerable quantity of water effused. This, however, in the opinion of the faculty, was not a favourable symptom. Almost immediately afterwards, a small speck—the alarming precursor of mortification—appeared upon upon the heel of the foot from which the water had issued. The symptoms did not immediately vary; but the bulletin, issued on the following Tuesday morning, announced, that her Majesty's state, during the night, had been one of "great and imminent danger," and that she continued very ill. The first alarming change in the state of the Queen was on Monday afternoon; and it was of such a nature, as to induce Sir Henry Halford to write to the Prince Regent, to hasten his departure from London. His Royal Highness immediately sent for the Duke of York to accompany him to Kew Palace. Her Majesty, having somewhat recovered in the afternoon, they left her for the night. About ten the next morning, a serious change for the worse took place, and Sir H. Halford sent off an express, which arrived soon after eleven at Carlton House, and the Prince sent instantly for the Duke of York to accompany him to Kew. Their Royal Highnesses arrived at Kew Palace before half-past twelve, and repaired to the chamber of their expiring parent, who was perfectly sensible of their presence. The scene was truly distressing, and the Prince Regent had the trying task of supporting his mother in her last breathings—a fit though melancholy close of his incessant attendance, during her long and afflicting illness of six months. His Royal Highness was assisted by the Duke of York, and their royal sisters, the Duchess of Gloucester, and the Princess Augusta. After the event, the brothers and sisters retired to a private room, where the Regent remained several hours. At three o'clock, a public notification of the event was made; and in the evening a special Gazette, supplementary to the regular one, was published, for the express and sole purpose of announcing her Majesty's decease, in the following words:—

"Whitehall, Nov. 17.—This day, at one o'clock, the Queen departed this life, to the inexpressible grief of the royal family; after a tedious illness, which her Majesty bore with the most pious fortitude and resignation. The many great and exemplary virtues which so eminently distinguished her Majesty throughout her long life; were the object of universal esteem and admiration amongst all classes of her Majesty's subjects, and render the death of this illustrious and most excellent Princess an unspeakable loss to the whole nation."

Two days after her Majesty's death, the royal remains were deposited in an interior coffin; and, upon the outer, or state coffin, was placed the following inscription:—

Herein are the remains Of the most Serene Princess Charlotte, by the Grace of God, Queen Consort of the most August and Powerful Monarch,
George the Third, by the Grace of God,
King of Great Britain and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, King of Hanover,
And Duke of Brunswick and Lunenberg,
Died on the Seventeenth of November, in the Year
Of our Lord 1818
And of her Age the 75th.

Wednesday, the 2d of December, the day appointed for the funeral, was observed throughout the metropolis and its vicinity with every mark of respect for the memory of the Queen. The Bank, the Exchange, and all other public places of business were shut. The shops were all wholly or half closed, and nothing was done in the way of trade, but what the necessities of the day required. Mourning was nearly universal, and scarcely a private or hackney carriage was to be seen that was not proceeding westward to the funeral at Windsor. The churches were mostly opened for divine service, the pulpits covered with black, and sermons appropriated to the melancholy occasion were delivered. The numbers that left town at an early hour to witness the procession were immense. Coaches, stages, and carriages of every description, were filled, and it was computed that upwards of 5000 were employed on the occasion. The pedestrians were numberless, and many of them had set out on their journey to Kew long before day-break. The morning was dark, cold, wet, and altogether uncomfortable. It rained very heavily at five o'clock, and fears were entertained that the day would be most unfavourable. Towards seven o'clock, however, the sky cleared up. The state coffin had arrived at Kew Palace on the preceding Monday night: and the corpse of her Majesty having been brought down stairs, the screwing down of the coffin occupied only about two minutes. The dining-hall and ante (or coffee) room had been previously hung with black cloth. Behind, or at the head of the coffin, was affixed a silk hatchment, with the late Queen's arms. An elegant new pall was placed over the coffin, except a small portion of the foot, which remained uncovered for the public view. On each side of the coffin were placed four silk escutcheons, with the royal arms on them. Near the head of the coffin, on the top, was placed a crown on a cushion. The coffin was enclosed within a large square space, for the royal attendants to be stationed, and not to be interrupted by the public. On each side of the coffin were placed three round pillars, covered with black, of the height of the coffin when on the tressels; on each of these were placed remarkably large wax candles. Round the sides of the room were forty-four wax candles, in white branches. The ante-room was fitted up in a similar manner. Mr. Mash, of the Lord Chamberlain's office, was in attendance at an early hour in the Palace, on Tuesday morning, to direct the opening of the rooms, for the reception of those who were favoured with tickets to see the royal remains lying in state, so that not the least impediment occurred, but every thing passed off with the most perfect decorum the whole of the day. The Dowager Countess of Harcourt appeared as chief mourner, relieved by the Countess of Ilchester, another of the ladies of the late queen's bedchamber. They were assisted by gentlemen ushers to the late queen: and by two maids of honour, and two bedchamber women. The ladies wore black crape veils, and the gentlemen were in full court dresses. The honorary guard, which had been stationed at Kew Palace, turned out about half-past seven. They wore white gaiters. Their officers appeared with crape scarfs and sashes—crape was also placed round their caps, and round the hilts of their swords. At half-past eight, the hearse arrived at the Palace, accompanied by fifty undertaker's assistants, on horseback, in deep mourning, with silk scarfs, hatbands, &c. and escorted by a body of lancers. At a quarter after nine, an additional number of lancers scoured the roads, and prevented the approach of carriages, except those belonging to persons who were to take a part in the solemn ceremony. Soon after, a large body of lancers formed on each side of the road, obliging the spectators to fall back pretty close to the Thames. The remainder of this body were subdivided into two parties—one to precede, and one to follow the hearse. Almost precisely at ten o'clock, the procession moved from the Palace; and having crossed Kew bridge, proceeded towards Windsor, by the way of Brentford and Hounslow, halting one hour at Longford, a village between Hounslow and Colnbrook, for refreshment. At Frogmore, the procession was joined by his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, as chief mourner, who accompanied the remains of his royal parent to their last abode. From St. George's Chapel to the extremity of Windsor, the road was lined with foot-guards; from thence to Frogmore lines of cavalry kept the road; and, instead of every sixth man bearing a torch, there was one in almost every hand. Soon after seven o'clock, the advance of a party of horse showed that the funeral was coming. First marched a squadron of Life Guards, then came

seven carriages of the Queen, with the blinds up, drawn by six horses covered with black saddle cloths: but the great object of attention was the hearse, which next followed. A large body of Life Guards immediately preceded and followed it. After the hearse came the carriage of the Chief Mourner, the Prince Regent; and his Royal Highness was distinctly seen, notwithstanding the cloud of cavalry which hovered round his coach. The Duke of York rode in the same carriage with his Royal brother: his carriage and six moved next in the procession, after which followed the carriages of the Dukes of Sussex and Gloucester, and Prince Leopold, all full. The funeral pomp concluded with about a dozen coaches, belonging to the nobility and gentry connected with the household; and the rear consisted of a large body of Life Guards intermixed with Lancers. The grandest effect in the procession was the appearance of the military when the torches were lighted: the illumination extended nearly a mile, and the rich glow of their scarlet uniforms, together with their splendid helmets and caparisoned horses, gleaming along the lines, formed a picture that would have at once excited the transport and baffled the skill of the finest artists. The number of persons admitted as visitors within the walls of St. George's Chapel, on this occasion, and not forming part of the preparation itself, was limited to fifty-four, who were allowed, by means of tickets, to pass the eastern door of the chapel adjoining to the deanery, and to take their station in the organ loft, whence a tolerable view, both of the entrance of the procession and the solemn concluding ceremony, could be obtained. At eight o'clock, the notes of the organ were heard, and the choir entered, each singer bearing a torch in his hand, and singing Croft's anthem from the burial service, which produced an effect truly solemn and impressive. The procession then entered by the south door of the chapel. The Pall which covered the Royal body was supported by the Dukes of Northumberland, Dorset, and St. Alban's, on one side; of Newcastle, Montrose, and Beaufort on the other. The Royal Body was followed by the Chief Mourner, supported by the Marquisses of Buckingham and Winchester, and attended by the Marquisses of Bath, Salisbury, Headfort, and Cornwallis, as train bearers; next followed, as assistants to the Chief Mourner, Earl Delawarr, Viscounts Lake and Bulkeley, Lords Boston, Amherst, Arden, Graves, Longford, Beresford, Rivers, Grenville, St. Helen's, Henley, and Hill. The van of the procession moved forward into the choir, the Windsor Knights, &c. ranging themselves round, and on the steps of, the altar. The members of the Royal Family, and those noblemen on whom the Order of the Garter had been conferred, stationed themselves in their respective stalls: the great dignitaries of the Church, of whom were present the Archbishops of York and Canterbury, with the Bishops of London and Salisbury, occupied their respective places within the choir. The Royal Body having been carried to the steps of the altar, was placed on the platform prepared to receive it, the pall was removed, and the crown and cushion placed on the coffin. The Prince Regent, as chief mourner, being seated in a chair at the head of the corpse, surrounded by his supporters and train-bearers standing, the funeral service commenced in the usual manner, as performed at Cathedrals. The service was read by the Dean of Windsor. At the end of the first part, the celebrated anthem, by Kent, "Hear my Prayer," was introduced. The body of her Majesty was then let down into the vault prepared for it, and the solemnity was closed by Sir Isaac Heard, who pronounced, in a distinct voice, the style and titles of her late Majesty. As the mourners and attendants began slowly to separate, and to quit the chapel, the notes of the organ again filled the edifice, and produced at once the richest and most soothing effect. The numerous company separated without the least disorder or inconvenience, and in a few minutes after the obsequies of her late Majesty had closed, no vestige remained of the solemn pageantry which had just passed before the eyes of the spectators. Of his Majesty's Ministers the following were present:—Lords Liverpool, Sidmouth, the Lord Privy Seal, the Lord President, the Honourable C. Bathurst, George Canning, and W. W. Pole. *

* Her Majesty, the Princess Sophia Charlotte Caroline, of Mecklenburgh Strelitz, the youngest daughter of Charles Lewis, brother to Adolphus Frederick, third Duke of Mecklenburgh Strelitz, by Albertine Elizabeth, daughter of Ernest Frederick, Duke of Saxe-Hilbourghausen, was born on the 6th of May, 1744. Having been fixed upon as the Consort of George III. as soon as the preliminary arrangements for demanding this Princess in marriage had been made, his Majesty, on the 28th of July, 1761, (having just then turned the three and twentieth year of his age), caused his Privy Council to be speedily summoned. The Council was attended by all the great officers of state; and to them his Majesty declared his intention in the following words:—

"Having nothing so much at heart as to procure the welfare and happiness of my people, and to render the same stable, and permanent to posterity, I have, ever since my accession to the throne, turned my thoughts towards the choice of a Princess for my Consort; and I now, with great satisfaction, acquaint you, that, after the fullest information, and mature deliberation, I am come to a resolution to demand in marriage the Princess Charlotte of Mecklenburgh Strelitz—a Princess distinguished by every eminent virtue, and amiable endowment, whose illustrious line has constantly shown the firmest zeal for the Protestant religion, and a particular attachment to my family. I have judged proper to communicate to you these my intentions, in order that you may be fully apprized of a matter so highly important to me, and to my kingdoms; and which, I persuade myself, will be most acceptable to all my loving subjects." This declaration was immediately made public, and was received with great pleasure by all ranks of people. The Earl of Harcourt soon after left England, as his Majesty's plenipotentiary to the court of Mecklenburgh, and arrived at Strelitz on the 14th of August. He was accompanied by the Duchesses of Ancaster and Hamilton, the two finest women of the British Court, and Lord Anson was appointed to command the fleet of convoy on this important occasion.

On the 15th of August, the Earl of Harcourt performed the ceremony of asking, in form, her Serene Highness the Princess Sophia Charlotte in marriage for the King, his master. The contract of marriage was immediately signed, and the Princess was afterwards complimented by the states of the country, and the deputies of the towns. On the 17th, the Princess, accompanied by the reigning Duke, her brother, set out for Stade, where she arrived on the 22nd, and embarked on board his Majesty's yacht, accompanied by the Duchesses of Ancaster and Hamilton, the Earl of Harcourt, and Lord Anson. Falling down the Elbe, she proceeded to Cuxhaven, whence she sailed for England, on the 28th. After a voyage of ten days, during which the fleet endured three violent storms, the Princess arrived in the port of Harwich, on Sunday, the 5th of September. She landed on Monday, at Harwich, and was received by the mayor and aldermen in their usual formalities. Proceeding on her journey to London, about five o'clock she came to Colchester, where she stopped and took refreshments at the house of a Mr. Enew. While she remained here, Mr. Great, of Colchester, being introduced by the Earl of Harcourt, presented her with a box of candied Eringo root, a product of Colchester, which the Royal Family always receive when they travel that way. Continuing her journey, she arrived at the Marquis of Abercorn's soon after seven o'clock, where a sumptuous entertainment was provided for the Princess and her suite. She remained that night at the Marquis of Abercorn's—and at noon, on the following day, came to Rumford, where the King's coach and servants met her. Having refreshed herself at the house of Mr. Dutton, wine merchant, she entered the royal coach and proceeded to London. On her arrival at the garden gate of the Palace, the Princess was handed out of the coach by the Duke of Devonshire, as Lord Chamberlain, to the gate, where she was received by the Duke of York. As she alighted from the coach, his Majesty descended the steps from the Palace into the garden, and they met each other half way. As the Princess was going to pay her obeisance, the King took hold of her hand, raised her up, saluted it, and then led her up stairs. At nine o'clock in the evening, the marriage ceremony was performed at the Chapel Royal, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, in the presence of all the Royal Family; the Duke of Cumberland giving the Princess's hand to the King.

On the 22nd of September, their Majesties' coronation was performed with great splendour, in Westminster Hall, which was laid open and fitted up for the occasion. The usual but singular ceremony of the Champion's challenge to any person who should dispute the succession, was regularly gone through. Mr. Dymoche, Lord of the manor of Scrivelsby in Lincolnshire, the King's Champion, entered the Hall in white armour, on a white horse, richly caparisoned (belonging to the deceased King George II. and rode by him at the battle of Dettingen), attended by two esquires, and the herald at arms, who read the words of the challenge three times; when the champion threw down the gauntlet, which, after remaining some time, was picked up and returned. His Majesty then pledged the Champion in a gilt bowl of wine, which he sent by the cup-bearer, and the Champion drank to the King, and retired with the gilt bowl as his perquisite. The coronation sermon was preached by the Bishop of Sarum, who took for his text, 1 Kings, x. 9—"Because the Lord loved Israel for ever, therefore made he thee King to do judgment and justice." From these words he deduced two important truths—1. That when great and good Kings reign, they are the means by which God blesses a people. It is not said because the Lord loved Solomon, but because he loved Israel, therefore made he Solomon King. 2. That the duty and the end of royalty are to do judgment and justice. The rejoicings throughout the country on this occasion almost exceeded any former precedent. Addresses of congratulation poured in from all quarters, the union of their Majesties seemed to be viewed,

A. D. 1819.] The new parliament met on Thursday the 14th of January; when, in the Upper House, the Chief Baron Richards took his seat on the woolsack, by patent, pro tempore, in the place of the Lord Chancellor, whose indisposition, which had been of some standing, deprived, for a time, the country of his public services.

In addressing the parliament, which was assembled on the 6th of November, his Majesty thus alluded to his recent union:—"My Lords and Gentlemen; at the opening of the first parliament summoned and elected under my authority, I with pleasure take notice of an event, which has made me completely happy, and given universal joy to my loving subjects. My marriage with a Princess, eminently distinguished by every virtue and amiable endowment, whilst it affords me all possible domestic comfort, cannot but highly contribute to the happiness of my kingdom, which has been, and always shall be, my first object in every action of my life. I dare say, your affectionate regard for me and the Queen, make you go before me in what I am next to mention—the making an adequate and honourable provision for her support, in case she should survive me. This is what not only her royal dignity, but her own merit calls for—and I earnestly recommend it to your consideration." Parliament attended liberally to this recommendation, and provided for the support of her Majesty, agreeably to the Sovereign's wishes, a jointure of 100,000*l.* per annum, which was settled upon her by an act of the legislature, together with the Palace of Richmond and Somerset House. At the conclusion of the session, on the 2nd of June, 1762, his Majesty thanked his faithful Commons in these words:—"I return you my sincere thanks for the proof which you have given of your regard to me, and to my family, in the ample provision you have made to the Queen; whose virtues and affection to this country will, I am confident, be found to deserve it." In the following year the nation exulted in the birth of an heir to the throne. The hope of continuing the Protestant succession in his Majesty's family was now changed to a kind of certainty, and the birth of an heir was of itself sufficient to have established the popularity of a Queen of England, even had she wanted those many virtues which her Majesty was so well known to possess.

The following are the issue of the Royal pair:—1. George, Prince of Wales, born August 12, 1762, K. G.; appointed Regent, February 6, 1811, married, April 8, 1795, to the Princess Caroline of Brunswick, born May 17, 1768, by whom he had issue Charlotte Augusta, born January 7, 1796, married May 2, 1816, to Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg; died November 5, 1817. 2. Frederick, Duke of York, born August 16, 1763; elected Bishop of Osnaburgh, February 27, 1764, K. G.; married September 29, 1791, to the Princess Frederica Charlotte Ulrica, Princess Royal of Prussia, born May 7, 1767, died 1820. 3. William Henry, Duke of Clarence, born August 21, 1765; K. G. and K. T. 4. Charlotte Augusta Matilda, Princess Royal of England, Lady of the Imperial Russian Order of St. Catherine, born September 29, 1766, married May 18, 1797, to the Duke late King of Wirtemberg. 5. Edward Duke of Kent, K. G. born November 2, 1767, died January 23, 1820. 6. Princess Augusta Sophia, born November 8, 1768. 7. Princess Elizabeth, born May 22, 1770. 8. Ernest, Duke of Cumberland, K. G.; born June 5, 1771; married May 29, 1815, to Frederica Sophia Caroline, daughter of the late Duke of Mecklenburg Strelitz, born March 2, 1728. 9. Augustus Frederick, Duke of Sussex; born January 27, 1773. 10. Adolphus Frederick, Duke of Cambridge, K. C.; born February 24, 1774. 11. Princess Mary, born April 25, 1776. 12. Princess Sophia, born November 3, 1777. 13. Octavius, born February 23, 1779, died May 3, 1783. 14. Alfred, born September 22, 1780, died August 20, 1782. 15. Amelia, born August 7, 1783, died November 2, 1810.

Decorum and correctness were the leading characteristics of the court of George III.; and the duties demanded by such a court were performed by the Queen with the greatest success. Her Majesty's figure was pleasing, but her countenance, though not without attraction, when she smiled, could not boast any claim to beauty. It is a well known fact, however, that the King declared himself satisfied with his connubial fortune. She was by no means deficient in those external and elegant accomplishments which add so much grace and dignity to those who hold a pre-eminence in rank and station, and although her manners were somewhat tinctured with the distance and reserve of superiority, yet they were blended with a sincerity and benignity that compensated for any imposed restraint. A knowledge of most of the European languages she could hardly fail to acquire. She was a great proficient in music, and composed many pleasing pieces. She was also extremely skilful in the embroidery of flowers. It was in her Majesty's private and domestic character, as already stated, that she was most admired. As a wife and a mother, she was a pattern and ornament to her sex. Her Majesty performed all the tender and maternal offices of a nurse to her Royal offspring, an example which, although but too seldom followed, reflected the highest honour upon her exalted station. She behaved from the first with a gentleness and conciliation which formed the basis of that conjugal felicity which subsisted between her and the King for so many years. With the exception of the calamity that befel her Royal Consort, and latterly some unhappy events in her own family, perhaps no Queen ever had fewer sources of uneasiness. And what every honest man would wish to see his daughter become in the relations of domestic life, every unprejudiced man might behold in the character of her late Majesty. During the long period in which her Majesty may be said to have presided over the English Court, it was remarkable for the steady countenance uniformly extended to virtue, and as uniformly withdrawn from its opposite. Having married at an early period of life, it required a more than ordinary effort of intellect to resist the false glare of a court and all its fascinations. When her Majesty was united to our late revered Sovereign, there was hardly a Court in Europe that was not marked by its licentiousness. The vices of the French Court notoriously led to the revolution, which deluged that fine country with blood; and it is equally true, that the same cause occasioned, in a great measure, the horrors with which Spain and Naples were subsequently visited. During that time, England presented from the throne the example of those virtues that form the great and binding links of the social chain; and to it we may in part ascribe our happiness in having withstood the storm which visited the rest of Europe with all the horrors of invasion or anarchy. This example was the more salutary, as every thing in our situation tended to an excessive dissoluteness of manners. Our sudden and rapid prosperity was calculated to produce the greatest moral relaxation: and it is undeniable, that the influence of the domestic life led by their Majesties, powerfully contributed to check the torrent of corruption, which, from a vast accumulation of wealth, threatened to overflow the face of the country. In public her Majesty never tolerated any person in her presence, however high their rank, who had been guilty of any gross breach of those laws which refinement has introduced among men, for the preservation of society; of which, the following anecdote is a striking instance:—the Countess of C——, a woman of high birth, ancient family, and great connections, applied to a lady who was much about her Majesty's person, to beg her interference with the Queen, that her sister, who had committed a faux pas, and was, divorced, might be allowed to go to the drawing-room, she having been married to the man against whom her former husband had obtained damages. This was a very delicate task, and required great address, even to bring the subject before her in any shape. The lady, however, succeeded so far as to prefer the request. Her Majesty for that time turned the conversation, and it there ended; but on the repeated solicitations of the Countess, this lady, who was high in her Majesty's favour, again ventured to urge it; and on receiving no reply, demanded of the Queen what it was her gracious pleasure she should say to the Countess. "Tell her," said the Queen with indignation, "you had not the impudence to ask it." In private life, her Majesty had ever been noted for her strict attendance on divine worship; and, unless prevented by illness, the family regularly attended service in the Royal private chapel at Windsor, or in the private apartments at the palace. Piety and devotion waited on her steps, and heightened the pleasures of her conjugal and maternal endearments. She was popular when Lord Bute's administration had rendered the King very much the reverse. She gave beautiful children to the country. She interested the people of England as a fruitful mother; and was considered with general regard as a domestic woman: so much so, that Colonel Barré then a violent opposition speaker, delivered a very splendid eulogium on her "mild, tender, and unassuming virtues." Her Majesty continued to enjoy uninterrupted felicity with her royal husband until the year 1788, when the King first betrayed symptoms of insanity. She then watched over him with increasing tenderness. In appointing a Regency, the ministry proposed restrictions on the Regent, which raised a strong spirit of opposition. At this critical and delicate juncture, her Majesty's affections were divided between her consort and her son, and, we believe, on this occasion alone, did she depart from her determination to keep aloof from politics. The part which she took, however, was equally honourable to her as a sovereign and a wife. In the former capacity, she adhered to the constitution; in the latter she asserted the rights of her husband, when disease had incapacitated him from defending himself. With the exception of this observation, we do not know of any intermixture on her part with the politics of the day. Even Junius, who attacked the court with so much rancour, and who was not likely to have spared any branch of the Royal Family, is wholly silent as to her Majesty, except where he severely rebukes the late Duke of Grafton, the Prime Minister at that time, for having led his mistress through the Opera House, in the presence of the Queen. This rebuke is an additional proof of the high sense which that popular writer entertained of the purity of her Majesty's character, and of the decorum which ought to have been observed in her presence. The King recovered from his illness in three months; and the country, from one end to the other, gave the greatest demonstrations of joy, loyalty, and attachment to his person and family. On this occasion, the Queen observed, that "A sovereign's greatest glory consisted of his people's affections."

It has been said that her Majesty was rather of a penurious, if not of an avaricious disposition. It is very true that her Majesty was not found among the lists of those ostentatious charities which frequently appear before the public; but she was by no means deficient in those feelings of commiseration for the sufferings of her fellow creatures, which is so bright an ornament to our nature. To her pecuniary affairs she was certainly very attentive, and it is not a little creditable to her that she was scrupulously attentive to the payment of her own tradesmen. There is every reason to believe, that her Majesty was at all times disposed to assist distress, and to patronize merit. One of the first acts of her Majesty's benevolence was the forming of an establishment for the daughters of decayed gentlemen, or orphans. A house and grounds were purchased in Bedfordshire, and a lady of high talents placed therein, at a salary of 500*l.* to instruct the pupils in embroidery, &c. They were taken in at fifteen years of age. The produce of their labour was converted into ornaments for window curtains, chairs, sofas, and bed furniture, for Windsor Park, and the Palace in St. James's Park. In the neighbourhood of Windsor she performed many acts of charity; and established a school for the children of poor parents, who were educated and clothed at her expence, and supplied with situations after they had gone through their course. On the recovery of his Majesty from his first illness, too, she founded another school on the same principle as the former. On that occasion her Royal Highness the Princess Sophia presented each viewed, not alone as a measure of political importance, by which the regular succession to the crown was likely to be preserved, but as a species of national blessing, from which the best moral consequences were likely to proceed.

In the House of Commons Mr. Manners Sutton was unanimously elected speaker. From the 14th till the 21st of the month, both Houses were occupied in swearing in their respective members. On the latter day the session was regularly opened by commission. The Lord Chancellor was sufficiently recovered to take his seat on the woolsack upon the occasion, Of the Royal Speech, the main topics were, the King's health—the demise of the Queen—the evacuation of France by the allied troops—the probability of a durable peace—the favourable state of the revenue—the improved aspect of trade, manufactures, and commerce—the favourable result of the war in India—and the conclusion of a treaty with the United States of America, for extending, to a further term of years, the existing Commercial Convention. In the Upper House, the address was moved by the Earl of Warwick, and seconded by Lord Saltoun. Some comments, by the Marquis of Lansdowne, on the omission of certain subjects, which, he contended, ought to have been mentioned in the Speech, were replied to by the Earl of Liverpool; after which, Lord Lauderdale intimated his intention to move for an enquiry respecting the metallic currency of the country, and the Address was agreed to nem. con. The Earl of Liverpool gave notice of a motion respecting the Windsor Establishment; and he also stated, that satisfactory measures were likely to be adopted for preventing the forgery of Bank Notes. In the Commons, Mr. Brownlow, one of the members for Armagh was the mover, and Mr. Peel, brother of the late Secretary for Ireland, the seconder of the Address; which, after the conduct of Ministers had been animadverted upon, with some severity, by Mr. M' Donald, and defended by Mr. Sinclair, Mr. Clive, and Mr. Canning, was agreed to, without a dissentient voice.

In conformity with the intimation in the Royal Speech, at the opening of the session, that the death of the Queen would render necessary an Act for the appointment of a new guardian of the King's person, the Earl of Liverpool, on the 25th of January, introduced a motion for the purpose of nominating to that office his Royal Highness the Duke of York. To this proposal no objection was made; and after some discussion as to the patronage to be enjoyed by his Royal Highness, the Bill was passed. Several interesting discussions subsequently arose respecting the Royal Establishment at Windsor; the main point of which—that of granting 10,000*l.* a year to the Duke of York, as custos of the royal person, from the public instead of from the privy purse, was carried by the committee only by 281 against 186. In another division on the subject, the numbers in favour of the measure were 247 against 137; and, on a third division, the Ayes were 156 and the Noes 97. The subject also excited much freedom of remark, both in and out of Parliament.

Another topic, of a nature most deeply interesting to the best friends of humanity, occupied the attention of parliament at an early part of the session. This was the state of the Criminal Code. The astonishing variety and appalling multitude of offences, more than 200 in number, against which capital punishment was denounced by the Statute Book, had long been reprobated by philanthropists, both foreign and native, as a national disgrace, and stigmatized by philosophical lawyers as a fruitful source of mischief, crime, and infamy. By the opponents of the existing system, it had been remarked, that it was the certainty rather than the severity of punishment which tended to deter offenders; and it was obvious, that penalties, which the general feeling of society condemned as incommensurate with offences, were of all others the most uncertain of being carried into effect. Principles such as these had repeatedly been brought before the House of Commons by Sir Samuel Romilly, who had proposed several bills founded upon them, one of which had become part of the law of the country. The melancholy loss of that distinguished and estimable individual had now thrown the cause into other but not less active hands.* A petition from the city of London, in its corporate capacity, complaining of the increase of crimes, and pointing out the commutation of capital punishment, having been favourably received by the two Houses of Parliament, his Majesty's Ministers proposed to refer the subject to a committee, to be appointed for the examination of the discipline and police of the different prisons throughout the country. Accordingly, on the 1st of March, on the motion of Lord Castlereagh, the proposed committee was formed. It was the opinion, however, of those who were well in-each of the children with a medal, containing on one side an inscription of gratitude to the Almighty for the restoration of the King; and on the other, "When we forget him, may God forget us." It is an undoubted fact too, that her Majesty distributed large sums of money in the exercise of private charity: but her charity was really private, not ostentatiously performed, that the world might applaud the giver. It was an express injunction, which accompanied every act of benevolence on her part, that it should be kept secret. To each nurse of her children she gave a pension of 200*l.* a year; as well as to several of her sons. Among the many instances of her charity we select the following. Her Majesty took charge of, and educated the orphan child of an officer who died in the West Indies; the child was brought to England by the sergeant of the regiment; the Queen's notice was attracted by an advertisement in the public papers from the sergeant. Her Majesty not only educated this child, but caused it to be amply provided for. It is a fact equally known, that the Queen took under her protection the widow of an officer killed at Bunkers-hill, and educated the son. These two facts are mentioned, not as solitary instances of her Majesty's humane, charitable, and honourable feelings and disposition, but to shew the nature of the application of the large sums of money supposed to have been in her possession. Many a retired and solitary sufferer has been cheered by her royal beneficence, without knowing the hand from which the succour proceeded.

In addition to the numerous charities to which her late Majesty subscribed, none was more conspicuous (though not generally known) than the institution formed at Bailbrook Lodge contiguous to Bath. The Queen was the immediate patroness of this establishment, and not only contributed towards its support, but displayed great anxiety concerning its future welfare. The institution at Bailbrook House is formed after the German Chapitres, and other Protestant establishments on the Continent. It offers a desirable residence to ladies of respectable character, whose birth places them in the rank of gentlewomen: and the plan is so arranged as to suit the circumstances of those whose income is very moderate; at the same time it affords accommodation to others, who, by residing in the establishment, contribute largely towards its support; but this circumstance occasions no apparent inequality among the inmates, for all are, in fact, equally independent of pecuniary obligations, either to the public or each other. The society live together as one family; but none are admitted who are averse to a retired life, or who are unwilling to lend their aid in promoting works of charity and benevolence. It is principally intended for the reception of the widows and daughters of clergymen, and of officers in the army and navy. It is entirely under the auspices of ladies of the highest rank, and a fund of several thousands has been secured and placed out at interest. Her Majesty, when last at Bath, paid great attention to the above institution, minutely inspected every part of Bailbrook House, and expressed regret that there were not more establishments formed of the same kind in England.

* To the deep regret of the country at large, Sir Samuel Romilly perished by his own hand, in the paroxysm of a fever brought on by the irreparable calamity of the loss of a most beloved wife. Sir Samuel commenced his career at the bar, a young man liberally educated, with those high principles of honour, and that susceptibility of amiable and generous sentiment, which distinguished his life, but without paternal fortune, and, still more, with both his parents dependent upon his professional success. In this situation, he became acquainted with a young lady, the charms of whose mind and person won his affections. His conduct was worthy of his head and his heart. He declared his sentiments to the object of his affections; but added, that he must "acquire two fortunes" before they could be married: the first, for those to whom he owed his first duty—his parents; the second, for her. The lady knew how to appreciate his merit and his motives, and their vows were mutually pledged to each other. He entered upon his career of profit and honour, with that assiduous energy which forms a chief feature of genuine talent. In a comparatively short period he realized a considerable sum, and with it purchased an annuity for his parents. Having put them in possession of this provision for their lives, he formally declared to them, that his obligations to them were now fulfilled, and that he was about to enter into other relations, which must exclusively govern him in their turn. He began a second time with fresh spirit—acquired "a second fortune"—all within a very few years—settled it upon her on whom he had bestowed his heart, and married her. The maiden name of the late Lady Romilly was Garbett. She was the eldest daughter of Francis Garbett, Esq. of Knill Court, in the county of Hereford; and she was married to Sir Samuel at that place, on the 3d of January, 1798. Sir Samuel Romilly was for several years remarkably subject to nervous irritation (doubtlessly excited by his almost incessant mental exertions), which very frequently appeared in his barristerial avocations. One thus so easily affected must be proportionately susceptible of serious or fatal disorder in the brain, the seat of thought, and origin of the greater part of the nervous system, which, goaded by this irreparable domestic calamity, was pushed to that state of chaotic desperation as to induce the dire castrophe. It is a singular circumstance, that in the parish church of St. Bride, Fleet street, there is a simple undecorated tablet, placed against the wall, on which is an inscription to the memory of an ancestor of Sir Samuel Romilly, who died of a broken heart, seven days after the decease of a beloved wife.

formed,

formed, and deeply interested in the business, that, for the due consideration of so extensive as well as important a subject—a subject which embraced such an immensity of details—as the penal code, that a select committee should be appointed; and to that effect Sir James Mackintosh made a motion on the following day. That honourable and learned gentlemen, after adducing a variety of excellent observations, and a number of striking facts, illustrating the system of subterfuge which the dreadful severity of the law in many cases had produced amongst prosecutors, witnesses, and jurors, and the consequent impunity and increase of crime, proceeded to explain his particular views of melioration. He observed, that it was by no means his wish or intention to form a new criminal code: to abolish a system, admirable in its principles, interwoven with the habits of the people, and under which they had long and happily lived, was indeed a proposition very remote from his ideas of legislation. He did not even propose to abolish capital punishment: on the contrary, he held it to be a part of that right of self defence with which societies were endowed: he considered it, like all other punishments, as an evil, when unnecessary, but capable, like them, of producing, when sparingly and judiciously inflicted, a preponderance of good. He aimed not at the establishment of any universal principle: his sole object was, that the execution of the law should constitute the majority, and the remission the minority, of cases. Sir James Mackintosh subsequently divided capital felonies into the three following classes:—those on which the punishment of death was always—those on which it was frequently—and those on which it was never put in force. He proposed to leave, for the present, the first and second divisions untouched: the third, consisting of no fewer than 150 different crimes, ought, he conceived, to be entirely expunged from the list, as so many relics of barbarous times, disgraceful to the character of a free, a thinking, and an enlightened nation. Lord Castlereagh paid many compliments to the candid and moderate spirit in which Sir James Mackintosh had brought forward his motion; notwithstanding which, he persisted in opposing, as unnecessary, the appointment of a separate committee. Other members, however, warmly supported the proposal; and, it was ultimately carried, on a division, by 147 voices against 128. Previously to the close of the session, Sir James Mackintosh had the satisfaction of reporting progress as chairman of the committee.

On the 5th of April, in the House of Commons, Mr. Peel brought up a Report from the Secret Committee on the affairs of the Bank, announcing that the state of the Bank, in 1816, and 1818, had induced the Directors to pay in specie all notes issued prior to 1817; that this payment had occasioned a drain upon the Bank to the amount of upwards of 5,000,000*l.* sterling, most of which had found its way to the continent, and been there recoined into foreign money; and that, to prevent a continuance of this drain, and to enable the Bank to accumulate a greater quantity of bullion, with a view to the final resumption of cash payment, it was expedient to restrain the further payment of the notes alluded to in specie. The Honourable member moved, in conformity with this statement, that a Bill should immediately be brought into the House, and passed forthwith. A Bill was accordingly brought in; and, the standing orders of the House having been suspended, it was passed through all its stages the same evening; Mr. Manning, the Bank Director, in the course of the discussion, attributing the drain upon the Bank, and the passage of our specie to the continent, to the French loan, and a deficient harvest; corn having been imported into this country to the amount of 10,000,000*l.* In the Upper House, on the same evening, Lord Harrowby presented a similiar Report to that of the Commons' Committee; giving notice, that, on the succeeding day, he should move the suspension of the standing orders, that the Bill might be passed through all its stages at one sitting. Earl Grey, and others, opposed the measure at considerable length; contending, that, if necessary, it would have been better for ministers to issue an Order of Council for suspending the Bank payments, on their own responsibility. However, on the 6th, the Bill was brought up from the Commons; and, after it had been read a first, second and third time, and passed, it received the royal assent. A similiar Bill originated in the Commons, on the 6th, for the protection of the Bank of Ireland, and, on the 7th and 8th, that also passed through the Lords, and received the royal assent. At a subsequent period the resolutions of the Committee of Secresy were brought up to a Committee of the whole House; and, after a laborious and apparently impartial examination of the subject, in all its bearings, instructions were given for the preparation of a Bill, or Bills, to provide agreeably to the following clauses, for the gradual return of cash payments, and a general metallic currency:—

"1. That it is expedient to continue the restriction on payments in cash by the Bank of England, beyond the time to which it is at present limited by law.

"2. That it is expedient that a definite period should be fixed for the termination of the restriction on cash payments; and that preparatory measures should be taken with a view to facilitate and insure, on the arrival of that period, the payment of the promissory notes of the Bank of England in the legal coin of the realm.

"3. That in order to give the Bank a greater controul over the issues of their notes than they at present possess, provision ought to be made for the gradual repayment to the Bank of the sum of 10,000,000*l.*; being part of the sum due to the Bank on account of advances made by them for the public service, and on account of the purchase of exchequer bills under the authority of acts of the legislature.

"4. That it is expedient to provide, by law, that from the first of February, 1820, the Bank shall be liable to deliver, on demand, gold of standard fineness, having been essayed and stamped at his Majesty's mint, a quantity of not less than sixty ounces being required, in exchange for such an amount of notes as shall be equal to the value of the gold so required, at the rate of 4*l.* 1*s.* per ounce.

"5. That from the first of October, 1820, the Bank shall be liable to deliver, on demand, gold of standard fineness, essayed and stamped as before mentioned, a quantity of not less than sixty ounces being required, in exchange for such an amount of notes as shall be equal in value to the gold so required, at the rate of 3*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* per ounce.

"6. That from the 1st of May, 1821, the Bank shall be liable to deliver on demand, gold of standard fineness, essayed and stamped as before mentioned, a quantity of not less than sixty ounces being required, in exchange for such an amount of notes as shall be equal in value to the gold so required, at the rate of 3*l.* 17*s.* 10½*d.* per ounce.

"7. That the Bank may, at any period between the 1st of February 1820, and the 1st of October 1820, undertake to deliver gold of standard fineness, essayed and stamped as before mentioned, at any rate between the sums of 4*l.* 1*s.* per ounce and 3*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* per ounce; and at any period between the 1st of October 1820 and the 1st of May 1821, at any rate between the sums of 3*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* and 3*l.* 17*s.* 10½*d.* per ounce; but that such intermediate rate having been once fixed by the Bank, that rate shall not be subsequently increased.

"8. That from the 1st of May, 1823, the Bank shall pay its notes, on demand, in the legal coin of the realm.

"9. That it is expedient to repeal the laws prohibiting the melting and the exportation of the coin of the realm."

Numerous petitions having been presented to parliament, both for and against the Catholic claims, Mr. Grattan re-agitated this great question of internal policy in the House of Commons, on the 3rd of May. The causes of disqualification, he observed, were of three kinds: 1. The combination of the Catholics. 2. The danger of a pretender. 3. The power of the Pope. He insisted, that not only all these causes had ceased, but the consequences annexed to them were no more; even even the oppositions founded upon them were destroyed and annihilated. After expatiating at large upon the various points of the subject, the Right Honourable gentleman concluded his speech by submitting the following motion:—"That this House do revolve itself into a committee of the whole House, to consider the state of the laws by which the oaths or declarations are required to be taken or made as qualifications for the enjoyment of offices and the exercise of civil functions, so far as the same affect his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects; and whether it would be expedient, in any or what manner, to alter or modify the same, and subject to what provisions and regulations." The motion, seconded by Mr. Croker, and supported by Lord Normanby, Mr. Becher, and Sir Robert Wilson, was opposed by Mr. Leslie Foster, and Mr. Brownlow; and, on a division, it was lost by 243 against 241. The opponents of the measure contended, with what degree of accuracy it is impossible to say, that, in consequence of an expectation which prevailed on the Anti-Catholic side of the House that the debate would be adjourned, several members had retired; and that, had it not been so, the majority against the motion, instead of two, would have been about twenty-five. The number of members in town, on the day of the motion, was 574; of whom only 484 voted.

On the 17th of May, a corresponding motion was submitted to the Upper House, by the Earl of Donoughmore. Insisting that his Majesty's Catholic subjects were entitled to their full share of the privileges of the Constitution, and ought to be admitted to them, his lordship, in his prefatory remarks, contended that the position of the Catholic question had been greatly changed. All anti-christian principles, and uncharitable surmises, were disallowed by its opponents; and the great objection was limited to an arguable supremacy, which was supposed inherent in a foreign state. If he were allowed to go into the committee, he would, after getting rid of the declaration, next dispose of the oath of supremacy, when there would remain no vestige of such tests, except the oath of abjuration, now of no practical use, as it aimed at a non-existent family. The Bishop of Worcester opposed the motion, on the ground of danger to the church and state. That danger, it was argued by the Bishop of Norwich, did not exist; and we ought to do unto others as we would that they should do unto us. The Bishop of Peterborough said that, if the present question were one merely of religion, it should have his support; but it was evident that the grand object of the Catholics was political power. In this opinion, the Bishop of Peterborough was very warmly supported by the Earl of Liverpool; who also argued, that the concession would not operate to allay animosities in Ireland, and that the interests of the great mass of the people would not be affected by it in the smallest degree. The Lord Chancellor also most strenuously opposed the motion, chiefly on the ground that the Catholics could give no security by oath, which could reconcile the King's supremacy, in things temporal, with the Pope's supremacy, in things ecclesiastical. Various other noble Lords took part in the debate, after which, on a division, the motion was negatived, by 147 against 106. Another effort in behalf of the Catholics was made in the Upper House by Earl Grey, who introduced a Bill "for abrogating so much of the acts of the 25th and 30th of Charles II. as prescribes to all officers, civil and military, and to members of both Houses of Parliament, a declaration against the doctrines of transubstantiation and the invocation of saints." The Bill was allowed to proceed to the motion for its second reading, when it was thrown out, by 141 against 82.

No measure, introduced by ministers, had, for a long time, excited so warm and so persevering an opposition as that which was made to a Bill that was brought in by the Attorney-General on the 13th of May, for the purpose of prohibiting the enlistment of British subjects into foreign service, and the equipment of vessels of war without licence. The learned gentleman observed, that the first of these objects had been in some measure provided for by the statutes of George II. by which it was an offence amounting to felony to enter the service of any foreign state. He contended, however, that, if neutrality were to be observed, it was important that the penalty should be extended to the act of serving unacknowledged powers as well as acknowledged ones; and part of his intention therefore was to amend those statutes, by introducing after the words "King, Prince, State, Potentate," the words "Colony or District, who do assume the powers of a government." It was his wish, he said, merely to give to this country the right which every legitimate country ought to have, to prevent its subjects from breaking the neutrality towards acknowledged states, and those assuming the power of states. Upon a similar principle, it was his desire to prevent the fitting out of armed vessels, and also the fitting out or supplying other vessels with warlike stores, in any of his Majesty's ports. Upon the motion for leave to introduce this Bill, Sir James Mackintosh immediately arose, and warned the House, that in whatever manner the motion might be worded, and its real object concealed, the Bill ought to be entitled—"A Bill for preventing British subjects from lending their assistance to the South American cause, or enlisting in the South American service." Sir James Mackintosh stated also statutes of George II. adduced as authority on this occasion, not to have been as represented by his Majesty's Attorney-General, laws of a general nature, applying to all times and circumstances, but, on the contrary, they were intended merely for the temporary purpose of preventing the formation of Jacobite armies organized in France and Spain, against the peace and tranquillity of England. The honourable gentleman concluded his speech, by reprobating a measure which was virtually an enactment to repress the liberty of the South Americans, and to enable Spain to reimpose that yoke of tyranny which they were unable to bear, which they had nobly shaken off, and from which he trusted in God they would finally, and for ever be enabled to extricate themselves, whatever attempts might be made by the ministers of this or any other country, to countenance or assist their oppressors. Lord Castlereagh, deprecating the introduction of the political topics with which Sir James Mackintosh had nearly filled his speech, contended that the proposed Bill was necessary in order to prevent our giving offence to Spain, whom that House, he observed, was too just and too generous to oppress, because she was weak and her fortunes had declined. Was not, he enquired, the proclamation which had been issued about eighteen months before, approved both in England and America, as perfectly just in the principles of neutrality which it declared? Was it not, he also asked, a breach of that proclamation, when not only individuals, whom, perhaps, it might have been impossible to restrain, not only officers in small numbers, went out to join the insurrectionary corps, but when there was a regular organization of troops, when regiments regularly formed left England, when ships of war were fitted out in the English ports, and transports were chartered to carry out arms and ammunition? His lordship observed, that he felt some apology to be due to the House for not sooner bringing forward such a measure; but as long as any hope remained, of a mediation between Spain and her colonies, he had been unwilling to speak of the policy of the existing laws; and it was but lately that such hopes had been entirely dispelled. In the subsequent stages of the Bill, ministers candidly avowed that the measure had been suggested by the stipulations of a treaty with Spain, in the year 1814, and by the representations which the ministers of Ferdinand VII. had considered themselves as entitled by such stipulations to address to the British government. This admission excited some severe comments on the character of Ferdinard VII. and on what the opposition termed the baseness of this country's legislating on his suggestion, and to serve his purposes of tyranny and oppression. * The debate afterwards diverged into many many important questions of policy and rational law; and, as parallels or illustrations, historical facts were profusely brought forward. At length, the Bill was carried, in the Lower House, by 190 against 129; and, in the Peers, by 100 against 49.

Mr. Tierney's motion, brought forward on the 18th of May, for the appointment of a committee to consider the state of the nation, was negatived, by 357 against 178, ministers having contended, that the motion had been brought forward only for the purpose of embarrassing the real question before the House, which would be discussed in a few days, when the resolutions should be moved on the report of the committee on the affairs of the Bank. The Bank question was at length disposed of, by passing the Bills before alluded to.

On the 3rd of June, in a Committee on a Report of the Revenue and Expenditure Committee, the Chancellor of the Exchequer submitted a series of financial resolutions, which stated that, by the removal of the Property Tax, the Malt Duties, and other Taxes, the revenue of Great Britain was reduced by 18,000,000*l.*; that the interest and charge of the funded and unfunded debt of Ireland, exceeded the whole revenue of that country by 1,800,000*l.*; that the supplies of the present year might be stated at 20,500,000*l.*, to meet which the available revenue of the country amounted only to 7,000,000*l.*; that it was necessary to provide, by a loan, or other means, for the service of the present year, the sum of 13,000,000*l.*, which, deducted from the sinking fund of 15,000,000*l.*, left an actual sinking fund of only 2,000,000*l.*; that it was absolutely necessary to create an increase of revenue for the purpose of raising this sinking fund to 5,000,000*l.*; and, finally, that it was necessary to impose new Taxes to the amount of 3,000,000*l.* annually.

Agreeably to the recommendation of the Report of the Committee, Parliament ultimately agreed to raise 3,000,000*l.* of new Taxes, by a considerable duty on foreign wool, and by smaller duties on various other articles, such as tobacco, tea, coffee, and cacao nuts. Two loans of 12,000,000*l.* each were also made; one of them supplied by the money market, the other derived from the sinking fund. Out of these sums there was to be a surplus, of which 5,000,000*l.* were to go towards the repayment to the Bank recommended by parliament, previously to the resumption of cash payments, and 5,597,000*l.* to the reduction of the unfunded debt. "In adopting this course," observed the Speaker of the House of Commons, in his address to the Prince Regent, at the close of the session, "his Majesty's faithful Commons did not conceal from themselves that they were calling upon the nation for a great exertion; but well knowing that honour, and character, and independence, have at all times been the first and dearest objects of the hearts of Englishmen, we felt assured that there was no difficulty that the country would not encounter, and no pressure to which she would not cheerfully submit, to enable her to maintain, pure and unimpaired, that which has never yet been shaken or sullied—her public credit, and her national good faith."

The session, which had been of a nature more than usually busy, was closed by the Prince Regent, in person, on the 13th of July. The Royal speech expressed a confident expectation that the measures which had been adopted for the resumption of cash payments would be productive of the most beneficial consequences; regretted the necessity of additional taxation; anticipated important permanent advantages from the efforts which had been made to meet our financial difficulties; and, in adverting to the seditious spirit which was abroad in the manufacturing districts, avowed a firm determination to employ the powers provided by law for its suppression.

From the commencement of the year, and for some time previously, a party, which about this time, received the distinguishing appellation of Radical Reformers, had obtained much notice by their active endeavours at proselytism amongst the lower orders, chiefly of the manufacturing classes. One of their first steps was an application to the magistratial government of Manchester, to convoke a meeting for the alledged purpose of petitioning against the Corn Bill. This application was refused; and, in consequence, the meeting was summoned by an anonymous advertisement. Mr. Hunt, who had been selected as the hero of the day, was conducted to the place of meeting, by an immense multitude, in a sort of triumphal procession, preceded by music, and flags with appropriate mottos. A strong remonstrance to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent was adopted at this meeting, and many violent sentiments were uttered: the assemblage, however, dispersed without any actual tumult. This meeting was followed by many other meetings, of a similar nature, at Glasgow, Leeds, Stockport, Ashton-under-Line, and other manufacturing neighbourhoods. The strong measures of precaution that were taken by the respective local authorities, which the public orators of the multitude affected to support, had in most instances the effect of preserving order and tranquillity at these extraordinary assemblages. There was, however, a marked contrast between the peaceable demeanour of the auditors, and the inflammatory character of the language in which they were addressed. In the speeches delivered on these occasions, after the feelings of the audience had been excited, by highly wrought descriptions of the sufferings of the poor, the presumed causes of those sufferings were discussed: generally, these were stated to be pensions, places, exorbitant taxation, the usurpations of the higher orders upon the lower, &c. The want of a true representation of the people, unlike the present system, which was treated as a mere mockery, was pronounced to be the grand source of these evils; for which, Annual Parliaments, Universal Suffrage, and Election by Ballot, were pointed out as the only cure. At one of these meetings there was a discussion, whether the people had a right to destroy the Bank of England; and some suggestions were thrown out as to the expediency of a division of landed property, and a recurrence to physical force. By some, however, it was contended that these suggestions, which, happily, produced no practical results, were made by spies. Indeed it is not altogether improbable, that the agents of government, whose duty could not legitimately extend beyond the office of observing and faithfully reporting the proceedings which took place at these meetings, might occasionally have exceeded their instructions. One feature of the system, which was equally novel and disgusting, was the formation in Lancashire, of Female Reform Societies. These bodies entered into violent year of his age, having survived his Queen only about a fortnight. Charles IV. was born at Naples, November 11, 1748. He was son of Charles III. and of Maria Amelia of Saxony. He became Prince of Asturias in 1759, when his father succeeded to the throne of Spain, on the death of his (the father's) brother, Ferdinand VI. He married at the age of seventeen, September 4, 1765, Maria Louisa, of Parma, whose sway over him never ceased during their long union. He ascended the throne, December 14, 1788, and reigned till March 19, 1808, the day of his abdication in favour of his son; an abdication which had nothing in it of a voluntary character. When the melancholy journey to Bayonne took place, King Ferdinand withdrew his claims to the throne, which Charles IV. constrained by superior force, surrendered immediately into the hands of Buonaparte. It was therefore March 19, 1808, that terminated the reign of Charles IV. He had, during six years, a pension of 2,000,000 francs; but it was not regularly paid. He resided a short time at Fontainbleau, and at Compeigne; he then established himself with the Queen and the Prince of the Peace at Marseilles; whence he went to Rome, in 1811. After the fall of Buonaparte, Charles IV. again solemnly renounced his crown, in a treaty concluded with his son, the present King of Spain, who settled on him a pension of 3,000,000 francs, and agreed to pay his debts. At the breaking out of the French Revolution, this monarch made the most strenuous efforts to save the life of his ally and relative, Louis XVI. He charged his ambassador to deliver a letter to the National Convention, appealing to their mercy; it was presented to that assembly on the evening previous to the immolation of Louis; but they refused to open it, dreading that its contents might inspire humanity in the less violent minds of some among them. When he received the unhappy news of the King's death, Charles declared war against the French Republic, with which, however, he was forced to make an inglorious peace; and afterwards to unite his arm with France against England. This cost him immense losses, of which the battle of Trafalgar is one instance: nor could he maintain his usual intercourse with his colonies; the consequences of which are notorious.

resolutions, and called upon the wives and daughters of manufacturers, in different branches, to form sister societies, for the purpose of co-operating with the men, and of instilling into their children, what they were pleased to term, a deep rooted hatred of our tyrannical rulers.

At Birmingham, where the extensive and almost general distress of the working classes had given greater currency to the new doctrines, the Radical Reformers hazarded a bolder experiment than any they had before displayed. This was the election of a Member, or as it was denominated at the time, a "Legislatorial Attorney," to represent that great and populous town in the House of Commons. At a meeting, holden for this purpose, on the 12th of July, the managers of the design (amongst whom were Mr. Edmonds and Mr. Lewis, two schoolmasters; Mr. Wooler, the conducter of some periodical works devoted to the cause of the Reformers in London; and Major Cartwright) stated, that the issue of a writ being compulsory, they had not thought it necessary to wait for a mandate on this occasion; but that, in the exercise of their constitutional rights, and of the duty of good subjects, they should proceed to advise their sovereign by their representative. Sir Charles Wolsley, who had previously declared his resolution to claim his seat, should he be elected, was put in nomination, and instantly chosen by a show of hands; not fewer than 15,000 persons being present, and apparently concurring in this unprecedented act.*

A few days after this mock election had taken place, a meeting was holden in the great unrepresented town of Leeds, at which it was resolved that a similar election should take place there, as soon as an eligible member should be found. The government, at length, deemed it expedient to interfere. Sir Charles Wolsley was taken into custody, on account of seditious expressions used at a meeting at Stockport, in Cheshire; and an itinerant preacher, of the name of Harrison, for a similar offence, at the same place, was soon afterwards arrested, while he was attending a Reform Meeting in London. On these charges, Sir Charles Wolsley and Harrison were next year tried at the assizes, convicted and sentenced to imprisonment.

The Smithfield Meeting, at which Harrison was arrested, took place agreeably to previous announcement on the 21st of July. Some degree of alarm was naturally felt by the inhabitants of the metropolis on this occasion; and, for the purpose of preventing riot or disorder, very extensive and judicious precautions were taken, not only by the government, but by the Chief Magistrate of the city, and the Police in general. Besides calling out the Volunteer Cavalry, and the Artillery Company, and the enrolment of many thousands of citizens as special constables, the Horse and Foot Guards, as well as other regular troops, were under arms during the whole of the day. The guards at the Tower, the Bank, and the public offices, were doubled; a strong force, civil and military, was stationed at St. Sepulchre's, Newgate, the Compter, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and Christ's Church, all being in the immediate vicinity of the place of meeting. The City Police received notice to be on the alert at an early hour, to keep themselves sober, and by no means to imitate the multitude, but to be active and prompt in the execution of their duty. The Special Constables also received instructions as to their conduct. The orders given to the Police, and other branches of the Civil Power, were peremptory and distinct; that, if the meeting conducted themselves peaceably, not the slightest attempt should be made to interfere with their proceedings: but that the first symptoms of seditious incitement, or of actual preparation for breaking the peace, should be firmly and promptly resisted. The officers at the different Police Offices were ordered to hold themselves in readiness to move in any direction where their presence might be required. As early as eight o'clock, the city officers, and the firemen of the different companies, began to assemble in Smithfield, and were stationed in such places as would enable them to act with the most effectual co-operation. Many of the inhabitants of the immediate vicinity of the market, apprehensive of violence, removed the female part of their families and children. Most of the shops remained unopened; and, as the hour for the meeting approached, those that had been opened were shut. About eleven o'clock, thousands of persons hastened to the scene of action. The place at which the committee took up their temporary abode was kept a secret. City and Special Constables were placed as it were in ambush, in yards and other places, where they could be secluded from public view, at each of which was an out-post in the person of a superior officer. Not a soldier was to be seen. Newgate, and St. Sepulchre's Church, were partially occupied by a detachment of the East London Militia, principally composed of the Staff of the Regiment. The Sheriffs of London were at the head of a detachment of constables in the Charter House; the Lord Mayor presided in the Committee Room at Giltspur Street Compter, in readiness to issue directions; and patrols and orderly men, belonging to the City Light Horse, were in waiting. About twelve o'clock, the assemblage of people was increasing in prodigious numbers; and the waggon, whence the orators were to speak, arrived, accompanied by a posse of Reformers, carrying staves. The balconies and windows of the different Inns, Taverns, and private houses, in Smithfield were filled with spectators. At five minutes past twelve, the Reform Committee left the Flying Horse, in Charter House Lane, and proceeded to that part of the market opposite Cloth Fair, where the waggon, from which the harangues were to be delivered, was placed; and the unfurled banners, and two white boards, on which were painted the words "Order! Order!" were displayed. The committee took possession of the waggon; and soon afterwards Preston, a cobler who had distinguished himself amongst the Reformers, and Thistlewood, who was beheaded in the ensuing year for high treason, arrived. Next came Mr. Hunt, on horseback, accompanied by Mr. Watson, and preceded by a red flag, which he had used at the Westminster election, when a candidate as a representative of that city. After the preliminary business had been disposed of, and Mr. Hunt elected to the chair, that personage addressed the multitude in a florid speech, in the course of which he stated that he had received letters, threatening that if he appeared there that day, he should be shot. After some further proceedings, a person stood forward and moved a series of resolutions, eighteen in number. From these resolutions the following are selected, as curious matter of historical record, and as exhibiting, in a striking light, the character and objects of these meetings:—

"1. Resolved, that every person born in Great Britain and Ireland is, by inherent right—FREE.

"2. That, for the protection of the life, the liberty, and the property of every member in a free state, it is expedient and essential that a code of laws should be established, and executive administration thereof provided.

"3. That, as life, liberty and property, are equally dear to every man, whatever may be his rank, condition, or attainment, it follows of necessity, that every man, in a free state, is equally entitled to a voice in the enactment of such laws, and their provisional administration.

* The managers of this affair were subsequently indicted for a conspiracy unlawfully to elect a representative in parliament for the town of Birmingham. For this they were tried and convicted at the Warwick summer Assizes in the year 1820. In consequence, however, of some alledged informalities in the mode of empannelling the jury, &c. they, on the 23d of November following, moved for and obtained a rule to show cause, in the Court of King's Bench, why a new trial should not be granted.

"7. That, the persons who at present compose the British House of Commons have not been fairly and freely nominated or chosen by the voices or votes of the largest proportion of the members of the state.

[The resolutions then go on to declare, that, "from and after January, 1820, the meeting could not consider themselves bound in equity by any future enactments," &c.]

"10. That, with a view to accelerate the choice of legal and just representatives of the whole people, we will cause books to be forthwith opened in the different parishes of this metropolis, for the enrolment of the names and residences of every man of mature age and sound mind resident therein, so as to enable him to give his vote when legally required so to do.

"11. That an humble address be presented to the Prince Regent, requesting he will be graciously pleased to issue his writs to the Sheriffs and other returning officers of the different counties and cities of this Empire, to cause representatives to be chosen agreeably to the foregoing resolution, and to assemble in parliament in January next.

"12. That it is the right of every individual to retain and express his religious opinions, without being answerable to any human tribunal; and that it is wicked, intolerant, and unjust, to impose civil disabilities on account of any difference in religious profession.

"13. That this meeting unequivocally disclaim any share or participation in the acts of the boroughmongers, in placing Napoleon a prisoner to perish in a desert island, shut out from human society, and torn from his only son, &c."

Joseph Harrison, the itinerant preacher, seconded these resolutions, which were put and carried unanimously. Soon afterwards, a considerable bustle took place, which was occasioned by the arrival of Brown and Wontner, the city marshals, accompanied by Birch, from Stockport, and a posse of thirty constables, to arrest Mr. Harrison. On their getting into the waggon, Mr. Hunt turned to Brown, and said, "If you want me, I'll go with you." Brown said, "No, no; I don't want you, but Mr. Harrison." Mr. Harrison was then taken away by the constables, without any resistance on his part, or that of the multitude. Mr. Hunt, then, turning to his audience, explained to them the object of the constables. A few voices murmured, "They shan't take him;" on which Hunt requested them to let him go quietly. "If they apprehend me," said he, "I am ready with bail, and will try the question with them. Let me subpœna all of you here, and then, though they may get three villains to swear away my life, I shall not be afraid when I have 50,000 witnesses to contradict them. If only thirty of you should come day by day, the trial will last for three years!"

The next proceeding was to read the remonstrance to the Prince Regent, which had been agreed to at a meeting in Palace Yard, Westminster, on the 8th of September, 1818. This remonstrance was again unanimously agreed to. Numerous speeches followed, distinguished equally by their folly and absurdity, as by their inflammatory tendency. Amongst the disclosures of the day was one not a little curious, by Mr. Hunt, that the penny subscriptions, which had been calculated to create, in a year, a fund of 256,000*l.*, to promote the cause of Reform, amounted, at the expiration of ten months, to only 4*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* Some of the inscriptions on the flags which were displayed on the occasion were as follow:—"Peace and Good Will;"—"England, Ireland and Scotland;"—"Liberty or Death." Mr. Hunt at length took leave of the meeting, mounted his horse, and rode off amidst the acclamations of the crowd, which then dispersed in a peaceable manner.

On the third night following, an atrocious attempt was made at Stockport, to assassinate Birch the deputy constable for that township, an officer by whose active exertions both Sir Charles Wolsley and Mr. Harrison had been apprehended.* Vigorous measures were immediately adopted by government, for the discovery of the offenders; and, on the 30th of July, a proclamation against seditious meetings was issued.

The Manchester Reformers, who had posted up notices of a meeting, to be holden on the 9th of August, for the purpose of proceeding to the election of a representative, as at Birmingham, were informed, by the magistrates, that as the object of the proposed assemblage was unquestionably illegal, it would not be suffered to take place. In consequence of this determination, the design was relinquished; and, soon afterwards, notices were issued by the Reformers, of a meeting at Manchester for the avowedly legal object of petitioning for a reform in parliament, on the 16th of August. An open space in the town, called St. Peter's Field, was selected as the place of assembly; and never upon any former occasion, of a similar nature, was so great a number of persons known to be present. Some hours before the proceedings were to commence, large bodies of the Radical Reformers began to march in, from the neighbouring towns and villages, formed five deep, many of them armed with stout staves, and preserving a military regularity of step. Each body had its own banner, bearing a motto: "No Corn laws;"—"Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage;"—"Union is Strength;"—"Vote by Ballot;"—"Unite and be Free;"—"Taxation without Representation is Unjust and Tyrannical—Equal Representation or Death;"—"Let us die like Men, and not be sold like Slaves;"—"Liberty or Death." Some of the flags and banners were red, some green, and some black. Under a white silk flag, two clubs of Female Reformers appeared. The band of Reformers from Rochdale and Middleton marched to the sound of the bugle, and in very regular time, closing and expanding their ranks, and marching in ordinary or double quick time, according as it pleased the fancy of their leaders to direct them. They had two green banners, between which they had hoisted on a red pole a cap of liberty, crowned with leaves of laurel, and bearing the inscription "Hunt and Liberty." Another band bore a banner, in which Britannia was represented with her trident, leaning on a shield, upon which was inscribed the motto borne by Sir William Wallace, "God armeth the Patriot." Most of the flags were planted on a waggon, from which the orators were to deliver their harangues, in the centre of the field; others, remained dispersed amongst the crowd. A band of special constables took its station on the field without molestation. The numbers collected were variously estimated at from forty to eighty thousand. The arrival of Mr. Hunt was at length announced, by rapturous plaudits. He accepted the general invitation to preside, and, mounting a platform, raised on the waggon, commenced an harangue in his usual style. "Soon after twelve, on Monday," observes a writer on the spot, "the magistrates, and a body of constables, repaired to the ground to which the brigaded reformers had marched, and in consequence of depositions made before several of his Majesty's Justices of the peace, by many of the most respectable inhabitants of the towns of Manchester and Salford, in which they stated their apprehensions of riot and tumult as the probable consequence of such an assemblage of persons from different townships, marching thither under banners so explicit of rebellious intentions, the Riot Act was read, but it did not appear to be much attended to by the infatuated crowd, who continued to laugh and scowl at the constables, &c. in attendance. We understand the travelling orator had begun to address the Reformers, when, an hour having expired after the reading of the Riot Act, the warrants of the Magistrates were carried into effect."

* Birch, in whose heart a pistol ball had been lodged, and whose life was for some time despaired of, at length recovered, and a pension of 100*l.* a year was settled upon him by government. Two men, of the names of M'Ginnis and Bruce, were afterwards apprehended, tried for the attempt to assassinate, and were convicted. M'Ginnis was executed: but the sentence upon Bruce, in whose case some favourable circumstances appeared, was commuted for transportation.

Much

Much difference of opinion has ever since prevailed on this subject; and, perhaps, the Manchester Meeting is one of those events, upon which, in all its variety of details, historians will never be found to agree. Whether the Riot Act were actually read, is still a moot point: the Reformers, and their friends, insist that it was not; the Magistrates and their adherents, contend as pertinaciously that it was. Probability seems to favour the latter opinion; and certainly the affirmative of a proposition is more easily established than its negative. It seems to be agreed, however, that before Mr. Hunt had made much progress in his speech, a panic was raised at the extremity of the throng, by the appearance of the Manchester Yeomanry advancing in a rapid trot, towards the centre of the meeting. Mr. Hunt called out to the people not to be alarmed, but to stand firm, and receive the military with three cheers. This was done. The Yeomanry, however, after a momentary pause, to breathe their horses, and resume their ranks, drew their swords (according to some accounts, whilst others state that, in this first onset, they retained them in their scabbards) dashed into the crowd, and forced their way up to the hustings. The commanding officer then called out to Mr. Hunt, that he was his prisoner. Hunt, after exhorting the people to tranquillity, said that he would give himself up readily to any civil officer, who should produce his warrant. Nadin, the chief police officer, produced his warrant, and immediately took him in charge. Some of the other speakers, and a few of the auditors, were also seized, but two or three persons, against whom warrants had been issued, escaped amidst the confusion. After several individuals had been taken, a cry was heard among the Yeomanry, of "Have at their flags!" and they began dashing down, not only those in the waggon, but the others which were stationed in different parts of the field, striking, without scruple, to right and left, to get at them. "The whole of this grand manœuvre," observes a writer, who was an eye witness of the proceedings, "would have taken place without bloodshed, had not the mob assailed the military and civil authorities, with every resistance in their power, and particularly with missiles; consequently, the cavalry charged in their own defence; not without being first witnesses of a pistol shot from the multitude against one of the Yeomanry, who afterwards died of the wound. Ashworth, a special constable, was also killed upon the spot; and several other constables were hurt in the conflict. The soldiers forbore, with great humanity, from firing; but several of the infatuated populace felt their sabres, and some of them were taken into the Infirmary seriously wounded. Great difficulty afterwards occurred in clearing the streets and avenues from the lingering mob." According to other statements, the people fled in all directions, offering no resistance, beyond that of throwing a few brickbats;—the military gave a loose to their fury, and a scene of the most terrific nature commenced;—the crowd fell over each other in heaps;—some were forced into a cellar, and others through the doors of buildings;—numbers were trampled under foot, by men and horses;—many of both sexes were cut down by sabre strokes;—three or four persons were killed upon the spot;—and the wounded and hurt amounted to no fewer than 400. All this appears to have taken place within ten minutes, by which time, the field was entirely cleared of its recent occupiers, and filled with different corps of infantry and cavalry. Hunt and his colleagues, were after a short examination before the magistrates, conducted to solitary cells, on a charge of high treason. On the following day, notices were issued by the magistrates, by which the practice of military training, alleged to have been carried on in secret, by large bodies of men, for treasonable purposes, was declared to be illegal. Public thanks were by the same authority returned to the officers and men of the respective corps engaged in the attack of the 16th, in which particular gratification was expressed at the extreme forbearance that had been manifested by the yeomanry, when insulted and defied by the rioters. Nor was this the only testimony which was borne to the good conduct of the troops on that distressing occasion.

Upon the arrival at London of a dispatch from the magistrates to the secretary of the Home Department, giving an account of the melancholy affair, a cabinet council was held; the result of which was the return of official letters of thanks, in the name of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, to the magistrates, for their prompt, decisive, and efficient measures for the preservation of the public tranquillity, and to all the military engaged, for the support and assistance afforded by them to the civil power.

For some days, the town of Manchester and its neighbourhood, were in a state of constrained quietness, although some further disturbances, in which one or two lives were lost, had taken place. On the 21st of August, five days after the Manchester affair, a meeting, convened by public advertisement, was held at the Crown and Anchor, in the Strand, for the alleged purpose of expressing the public feeling on that deplored event. Mr. Wooler proposed a string of resolutions, strongly censuring the conduct of the magistrates and military, and returning thanks to Hunt and his colleagues. These were unanimously carried; as was also a resolution to raise a subscription for defraying the expenses of counsel, &c. in defence of the prisoners. In the same spirit, a meeting was, three or four days afterwards, holden in Smithfield. Sir Francis Burdett also addressed a violent letter to the electors of Westminster upon the occasion, for the writing of which letter, as a libel, he was afterwards tried and convicted.

In pursuance of Sir Francis Burdett's letter, an immense multitude assembled in Palace Yard, Westminster, on the 2d of September, for the purpose of declaring an opinion on the conduct of the magistrates and yeomanry of Manchester. After violent inflammatory speeches; occupying three hours in their delivery, by Sir Francis Burdett, and Mr. Hobhouse, his colleague in the representation of Westminster, the following resolutions were adopted, and an address to the Prince Regent founded thereon, was unanimously agreed to:—

"1. That by law and custom the people of this country have a right publicly to assemble, to petition the King and either House of Parliament; or to discuss any public matter, to complain of any grievance, and to propose such lawful remedies as to them may seem necessary.

"2. That the late meeting of the people at Manchester, called 'To consider the propriety of adopting the most legal and effectual means of attaining a reform in the Commons House of Parliament,' was a lawful meeting!

"3. That it appears to us, that when the people were thus lawfully assembled, and peaceably performing a public duty, they were wantonly, wickedly, and cruelly attacked by yeoman calvalry, under the direction of local magistrates, and that some of these were killed, others mutilated, and a still larger number miserably wounded and trampled upon.

"4. That the atrocious outrage on the defenceless and peaceable people, against all law, and in defiance of justice, is an attempt to destroy by the sword, all the yet remaining liberties of Englishmen.

"5. That this new mode (the only one of late resorted to) of answering the well grounded complaints and petitions of the people, is one of the many lamentable consequences of the House of Commons being every thing but what it ought to be—a real representation of the people.

"6. That the liberties we still possess can only be preserved—those we have lost restored—the peace, the comfort, the happiness of the people be promoted, and their property protected, by making the elective franchise so equal, so extensive, and so secure, that it shall be impossible to corrupt the electors; and the duration of Parliament so short, that it shall be the interest of the representative to act faithfully towards his constituents.

"7. That an address to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, founded on the foregoing resolutions, now be read."

The circumstances of the Manchester case turned out to be such, that government, by the advice of the law officers of the crown, found it expedient to abandon the threatened prosecution of Mr. Hunt and his colleagues, for high treason. Those persons were accordingly brought up from prison, before the magistrates, and informed, that they would be proceeded against for a conspiracy; for which, being only a misdemeanor, they might have bail. Mr. Hunt refused to give bail, even, as he said, to the amount of a single farthing; and he was in consequence conducted to Lancaster Castle. Scarcely, however, had he arrived there, when bail was offered by some of his friends, and he was liberated. On his return from Lancaster to Manchester, Hunt was drawn about two miles by women, and about ten by men. In fact, his return, was one long triumphal procession, waited upon by thousands, on horse, on foot, and in carriages, who hailed, with continued shouts of applause, him, whom they affected to regard as a champion and martyr in the holy cause of liberty.

At the assizes for the county of Lancaster, which commenced a day or two after, the Grand Jury found true bills against Hunt, Johnson, and Moorhouse, and the others who were committed with them on the charge of conspiracy. Declining to take their trials then, the prisoners availed themselves of the privilege of traversing till the spring assizes of 1820. Instead of Lancaster, however, the trial took place at York. It closed on the 10th of April 1820, the tenth day of the trial, when the Jury returned a verdict as follows:—"Moorhouse, Jones, Wild, Swift and Saxton—Not Guilty. Henry Hunt, Joseph Johnson, John Knight, Joseph Healy, and Samuel Bamford—Guilty of assembling with unlawful banners an assembly, for the purpose of moving and inciting the liege subjects of our Sovereign Lord the King into contempt and hatred of the government and constitution of the realm, as by law established, and attending at the same." The defendants entered into their own recognizances to keep the peace and good behaviour for six months, Hunt, in the sum of 2000*l*., Johnson 1000*l*., and Bamford and Healy 500*l*. each. In the ensuing term, (May 15,) Hunt, and his associates, received sentence; Hunt to be imprisoned in the gaol of Ilchester two years and six months, and at the termination of that period to find securities, himself in 1000*l*. and two in 500*l*. each, to be of good behaviour for five years; and Johnson, Bamford and Healy, to be imprisoned each one year in Lincoln Castle, each respectively to find securities in 100*l*. to keep the peace for five years.

Having pursued this extraordinary affair to its close, we return to the proceedings of the reformers; who, notwithstanding the tragical results of the Manchester meeting, still ventured to assemble as before, at Leeds, at Glasgow, and at other towns. At those meetings, the conduct of the Manchester magistrates and yeomanry became the subject of much vituperative eloquence. At those meetings, also, ensigns of mourning were exhibited; horrible details were given of the barbarous acts, alleged to have been committed by the yeomanry; and the sufferers of the 16th of August were eulogised as martyrs, and their memory classed with that of Russell, Hampden, Sidney, and other illustrious names of ancient times. On few however, if any, of these occasions, where the local authorities refrained from interposing, did any breach of the peace ensue; but at Paisley, &c. where the flags of the radicals were seized by the magistrates on their return from the meeting, some riots occurred; which, fortunately, were quelled without bloodshed. *

The regular opposition, or whig party, throughout the kingdom,

* The conduct and designs of the reformers, as displayed at these assemblages, are further illustrated by the following serio-ludicrous report of the proceedings at a meeting held at Carlisle, on the 8th of November, abridged from the Carlisle Patriot.—It was an adjourned meeting. Along with a multitude of banners, with mottos and devices, there appeared a board, to which were appended a tea kettle, a coffee pot, a snuff box, a tobacco box, a broken wine glass, two short old black pipes, a quart and a pint pot, and a broken ale glass. These were all empty, and turned up-side down, as indicative of uselessness, now that the radicals are determined to abstain from taxed commodities. The procession reached the ground about twenty minutes past one, and the leading men and lady radicals immediately ascended the hustings, where flags waved over their heads in proud triumph! The former chairman, Mr. John Bell, again took the chair; and having seated himself, Mr. Murdock stepped forward, with a cap of liberty in his hand, and said, "Fellow countrymen, this is a cap of liberty, which all of you know the meaning of, and by which you will stand as long as you have life. With your permission, I will place it upon the head of our worthy chairman."—(Cheers)—Mr. Murdock then planted the cap upon the chairman's head, and exclaimed, "There, Sir, there is a cap of liberty, and long may you live to wear it, to the dismay of all Tyrants." The chairman immediately presented himself, thus "gloriously crowned," and was loudly cheered. When the warmth of the applause had somewhat abated he stated that this meeting was held agreeably to a resolution passed at the meeting on the 11th of October, and its object was to induce all friends of radical reform to abstain from using certain exciseable articles, until the people had obtained the desired radical reform in the British House of Commons.—(Cheering.) Mr. Weemather stepped forward. He believed the meeting would agree with him, that taxation without representation was contrary to the constitution, and manifestly unjust. The people had long been cajoled by a set of men calling themselves whigs. These men constantly professed unbounded attachment to the cause of the people, and loudly preached about reform, retrenchment, and such like. They had made great and long speeches, pretendedly in favour of the people. But what did it all amount to? What did the whigs perform for the people, when Fox came into power? What blessings did the nation derive therefrom? Why the people soon found that the finger of a whig was heavier than the thigh of a tory.—(Repeated Cheers.) He would beg to make a few observations on certain men, who were invaribly conspicious in opposition to the rights of the people—upon men who had the impudence and audacity to call themselves the messengers of God upon earth—the clergy—who from their pulpits, denounced the advocates of reform as the enemies of God and their country, and pronounced upon them a sentence of eternal perdition, if they seek after rights. Oh! the wretches! the villains! they call themselves the ministers of the Gospel! they have ever exhibited an attachment to corruption, and have branded with impiety all those who seek to expose and pluck it down. And for why? because they are a part of the plunderers of the people—they eat that portion of the public burdens called tithes.—(Bravo.) Why are these reverend gentlemen so alarmed? The reason is, that a radical reform would be likely to bring about an inquiry into the origin of tithes; and it would be found out, very likely, that they were not intended for the support of the big-bellied Doctors of Divinity, but for the poor. This would turn out a most unfortunate discovery for them, but not so for the poor. Ten shillings a week were plenty for preaching two sermons on a Sunday.—(Cheering.) Let all present abstain from the use of exciseable articles, in order to keep the revenue down, for no pay no soldier, therefore the people must withold the means, and thus pull down the present abominable system. The resolutions were then read by Mr. Liddell, bootmaker. The following curious calculation formed the fourth:—"That the exciseable articles particularly referred to, are tea, which pays a duty of cent. per cent. or just one half, consequently, every five ounces of tea consumed by any family, pays a soldier a day's wages to prevent the people obtaining their rights and liberties; tobacco and snuff pay three pence an ounce, so that five ounces of these articles pay a soldier a day's wages; spirituous liquors pay eleven shillings per gallon, or better than fourpence per noggin, consequently every four noggins that a man drinks he not only abuses his own constitution, impairs his finances, benumbs his understanding, and paralyzes all the noble faculties of his soul, but pays a hireling soldier to keep him in subjection to a cruel and merciless taskmaster. Ale, which pays duties equal to spirits, may be viewed in the same light, as being equally destructive to the morals, the finances, and tends to the support of tyranny." Mr. Murdock then came forward and exhibited the flags, one after the other, to the meeting, explaining the mottos, and making observations on each as he proceeded. The inscription of "Liberty or Death," was received with very loud applause. He next exhibited the board with the tea kettle, snuff box, &c. before described. Taking the snuff box between the finger and thumb of one hand, he put his other hand to his proboscis, and exclaimed, in a loud voice, "Oh! my nose, my nose, my nose!" to the great amusement of his auditors. He next held up a rotten cabbage, much eaten by caterpillars, which he said was an emblem of the constitution, preyed upon by the boroughmongers. Several persons then went round with hats among the crowd, and upon the hustings, the result was—silver, 1*l*. 16*s*. 6*d*.; copper, 2*l*. 9*s*. 6d. total 4*l*. 6*s*. After the dispersal of the meeting, the lady radicals proceeded in a body, to the house of one of the sisterhood, in Shaddengate, where they enjoyed a comfortable cup of either mint tea or acorn coffee. Their male brethren were more for the substantials; for, at the Union Room, a party of about thirty partook of roast beef and giblet pie. Dinner over, the following purely radical sentiments were given, as were the healths of the leaders in this neighbourhood, and drank in the primitive liquor of man:—

1. May the English rose never blow,
   Nor the Scottish thistle ever grow,
   Nor the Irish harp ever play,
   Till radical reformers gain the day.
2. May the sons of corruption languish and pine,
   Whilst the sons of reform triumph and shine.
3. The immortal memory of Thomas Paine, and eternal destruction to all sorts of tyranny.
4. May the sun never shine on the palace of a tyrant, nor set on the cottage of a slave.
5. May radicals never cease to claim their dignity and station, Whilst boroughmongers do remain the curse of all the nation.
6. May that day soon come when all slaves shall cast their chains in the faces of their tyrants.

7. May kingdom, seized, with avidity, upon the solemn approval which had been given, so hastily, as they said, by government, to what they designated an illegal act of power, attended by circumstances of great violence and cruelty.

In consequence, numerous requisitions for town, county, and other local meetings, were signed on the occasion. In many instances, the sheriffs, or other constituted authorities, refused to comply with these requisitions; in which case, the meetings were frequently held under private auspices: most of them were numerously, and some of them very respectably, attended. A large meeting of the county of York was sanctioned by the presence of Earl Fitzwilliam, the lord lieutenant of the west-riding, and by that of many other noblemen and gentlemen of high consideration, who delivered their sentiments on the subject, in very strong and animated language. The resolutions, which were passed at this meeting, called loudly for an inquiry, which the Prince Regent was petitioned to institute, into the transactions at Manchester. The result of this proceeding was, that Earl Fitzwilliam was dismissed from the lord lieutenancy of the west-riding; an incident, upon which, the radicals, as well as the whigs, animadverted with great warmth and severity. An address of the Corporation of London, expressing deep indignation at the Manchester proceedings, and earnestly calling for inquiry, received from his Royal Highness the Prince Regent the following rebukeful answer:—

"I receive with feelings of deep regret this address and petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled.

"At a time when ill designing and turbulent men are actively engaged in inflaming the minds of their fellow subjects, and endeavouring by means the most daring and insidious to alienate them from their allegiance to his Majesty and the established constitution of the realm, it is on the vigilance and conduct of the magistrates that the preservation of the public tranquillity must in a great degree depend; and a firm, faithful, and active discharge of their duty cannot but give them the strongest claim to the support and approbation of their sovereign and their country.

"With the circumstances which preceded the late meeting at Manchester, you must be unacquainted, and of those which attended it, you appear to have been incorrectly informed. If, however, the laws were really violated on that occasion, by those to whom it immediately belonged to assist in the execution of them, the tribunals of this country are open to afford redress; but to institute an extra judicial inquiry, under such circumstances as the present, would be manifestly inconsistent with the clearest principles of justice."

To counteract the opposition meetings, and to neutralize their effects, loyal addresses, and offers for the raising of yeomanry corps, were zealously promoted by the friends of Government. A veteran battalion of between 10 and 11,000 men was also formed from the Chelsea pensioners.

At Lancaster, the Grand Jury threw out all the bills which had been preferred against individuals by the sufferers of the 16th of August. At Oldham, eight miles from Manchester, the Coroner's inquest sat for many days on the body of John Lees, one of the unfortunate men alleged to have lost his life in consequence of injuries received on that memorably fatal day. Great tumult was excited on this occasion; the inquest was, in consequence, adjourned to Manchester, there it occupied some weeks, in the course of which immense numbers of witnesses were examined; and, ultimately, the whole proceedings were set aside, on the ground of informality, in the Court of King's Bench.

Amidst the general ferment which had been produced by these circumstances, the meeting of Parliament was impatiently awaited by all parties. It assembled on the 23d of November. "I regret to have been under the necessity," observed his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, in his speech at the opening of the session, "to have been under the necessity of calling you together at this period of the year; but the seditious practices so long prevalent in some of the manufacturing districts of the country have been continued with increased activity since you were last assembled in Parliament. They have led to proceedings incompatible with the public tranquillity, and with the peaceful habits of the industrious classes of the community; and a spirit is now fully manifested, utterly hostile to the constitution of this kingdom, and aiming not only at the change of those political institutions which have hitherto constituted the pride and security of this country, but at the subversion of the rights of property and of all order in society. I have given directions that the necessary information on this subject shall be laid before you; and I feel it to be my indispensable duty to press on your immediate attention the consideration of such measures as may be requisite for the counteraction and suppression of a system, which, if not effectually checked, must bring confusion and ruin on the nation." The close of his Royal Highness's speech was as follows:—"Upon the loyalty of the great body of the people I have the most confident reliance; but it will require your utmost vigilance and exertion, collectively, and individually, to check the dissemination of the doctrines of treason and impiety, and to impress upon the minds of all his Majesty's subjects, that it is from the cultivation of the principles of religion, and from a just subordination to lawful authority, that we can alone expect the continuance of that divine favour and protection which have hitherto been so signally experienced in this kingdom."

In the Upper House, an amendment to the address, was moved by Earl Grey, in which, whilst the necessity of checking any practices dangerous to the laws and constitution was fully admitted, his lordship expressed a strong opinion as to the expediency and necessity of conciliation, and of inquiry into the transactions of Manchester, for the purpose of allaying the feelings to which they have given birth, and of satisfying the people that the lives of his Majesty's subjects could not be sacrificed with impunity. Lord Sidmouth said, the transactions at Manchester had had more exaggeration, misrepresentation, and falsehood, applied to them than to any other public transaction in his knowledge. The magistrates, many of them independent gentlemen, of the highest character, had every ground for suspicion against the persons who marched in military array with banners, and pikes bloody at the heads, to the places of meeting. There was yet stronger grounds of presumption in favour of the magistrates: to that day no prosecution had been instituted against them. He denied that the yeomanry had acted with violence or intemperance; they had merely done their duty in aid of the civil power. It was the opinion of the greatest authorities, that the meeting of the 16th was not only illegal, but treasonable. The members of the privy council, with the law officers of the crown, were of that opinion; also that the conduct of

Who rob and usurp the rights of the people.

21. May we never prove ourselves unworthy of the cause we have espoused.

* This said Cobler Jem is a well known character in Carlisle, and was in the habit of consuming eighteen pence or two shillings' worth of snuff weekly. This quantum he has taken for 50 years (we are within the mark) which at 1s. 6d. per week, to say nothing of interest, amounts to 195*l*. Add to this, that his wife has snuffed nearly the same quantity! Yet, wonderful to tell! but what cannot the principles of radical reform effect? Cobler Jem and his lady have thrown away their snuff boxes!!!

the magistrates was perfectly justifiable; and then the letter was written, applauding the conduct of the magistrates. He would not enter into the grounds for dispensing with the services of Earl Fitzwilliam, but the manner in which that nobleman had taken a part in the state of his country, rendered it impossible that any confidence, could subsist between the government and his lordship. After an animated discussion, in which the necessity of inquiry was strenuously maintained by the opposition peers, and as strenuously resisted by the supporters of administration, the House divided—for the original address, Contents 159—Non-contents 34—Majority 125.

In the Lower House, an amendment to the address, similiar in spirit to that which was proposed by Earl Grey, in the Peers, was moved by Mr. Tierney; who in an able and animated speech, drew a melancholy picture of the state of the country, which, he affirmed, the glaring misconduct of ministers had brought to the very verge of despair. The cause of parliamentary reform had been working its way for years, and the great mass of the people felt, with discontent and indignation, that the present state of the representation was not favourable to their interest. The diffusion of education, he added, which had been sanctioned by the legislature itself, had exposed Parliament to all the criticisms on its proceedings, which men deemed themselves justified by facts, and by their own knowledge, in making. If government thought, that by passing new laws, by raising additional regiments, or by the promulgation of loyal addresses, they could put down the awakened and excited spirit of the country, they would find themselves deplorably in error. The honourable gentleman then adverted to the transactions at Manchester; forcibly urged the necessity of inquiry; and made some severe remarks on the dismissal of Earl Fitzwilliam. Lord Castlereagh said, he felt it unnecessary to follow the honourable mover of the amendment, through his extended remarks on the state of the nation, because the only definite or tangible proposition which he had offered to the consideration of Parliament, was one for inquiry into the Manchester business; and further, because it was his intention, on the ensuing day, to lay before the House, in a printed form, the mass of information on which government intended to proceed, and also to explain the measures which it had in contemplation to propose. His lordship justified the means which had been taken for the dispersion of the assemblage at Manchester, and contended, as what he solemnly believed to be the fact, though conflicting evidence was, he admitted, to be expected, that previously to the interference of the military power, three attempts had been made to read the Riot Act. His lordship concluded by supporting the original address. The number of speakers on this important subject was very considerable; and, after some contest, the opposition succeeded in procuring an adjournment of the debate. On the succeeding day, the promised documents, respecting the state of popular feeling, were brought down and laid upon the table of the House. These papers consisted, in part, of the correspondence of official persons with the secretary of the Home Department, and in part, of communications to such persons, made by individuals whose names were, from prudential motives, withheld. Such of the letters of the Manchester magistrates as had been written previously to the 16th of August, expressed apprehensions that a formidable insurrection was in contemplation; at the same time they bore testimony to the deep distresses of the manufacturing classes, of which advantage was taken, by the disaffected, to instil their pernicious doctrines; and they assigned hunger as the natural cause of the willingness of the poor to listen to any wild or mischievous proposal that might be made for the melioration of their sufferings. The Manchester magistrates particularly dwelt upon the popular meetings and daily increasing licentiousness of the press, as the leading causes of their alarm. Some letters from the Earl of Derby, Lord Lieutenant for the county of Lancaster, referred to the failure of the attempts to raise a corps of yeomanry. It was stated, in numerous affidavits and depositions, that the practice of secret military training prevailed to a very great extent among the reformers; but, in some cases it was made to appear that nothing more had been intended by these men, than to enable themselves to march, in the semblance of military array, to their meetings; and further it was shown that sticks were the only weapons which had been employed in the exercise of drilling. A statement from Lord Fitzwilliam, on the state of the West Riding of the county of York, represented that the last reform meeting, on Hunslet Moor, had been less numerously attended than the former ones. This document was calculated to produce the impression that the rage for holding such meetings might safely be left to die away of itself. Sir John Byng, the military commander of the district, stated, that no doubt was entertained, that simultaneous meetings were to have been held at many neighbouring towns, which he named, but that the plan had been frustrated by disunion amongst the leaders. The distress and discontent of the people of the West Riding of the county of York, where pistols, pikes, and other offensive weapons, were reported to be manufacturing in considerable quantities, formed the subject of some of these communications; and similar representations, from the south west of Scotland, where employment and wages had fallen off in a still more deplorable degree, were afforded by others. The Grand Jury of the county of Cheshire, also expressed the alarm which was felt for their lives and properties by the loyal part of the King's subjects, where active measures of terror and intimidation had for some time prevailed.

On the 29th of November the Lord Chancellor introduced a bill, which, he observed, did not arise out of the circumstances of the times, but had been contemplated by him long ago. It had been the practice of the courts to allow defendants, in cases of information, or indictments, to imparle, or traverse. As great inconvenience had arisen from this practice, as trials were sometimes delayed till a very remote period, and as the ends of justice might thus be defeated, the bill would take away from a defendant the right of traversing; allowing the Court, however, to postpone his trial upon his showing ground for the delay. Earl Grey at once entered his protest against the whole of the measures, which, as it appeared, were in preparation, as calculated to bring the greatest misery, if not ruin, upon the country. The Lord Chancellor's bill was, upon the second reading, opposed by Earl Grosvenor, who contended that, whilst the Attorney General was allowed to hold informations over the heads of defendants for an indefinite length of time, it was greatly enhancing the grievance, by abolishing the right of traverse, for thus, the power of the crown was increased, and the security of the subject was diminished. Lord Erskine also objected to the measure, as depriving the people of an ancient and important privilege. His lordship remarked too upon the strange coincidence of this bill being brought forward, at a time, when the table of the House was covered with other bills, the tendency of which was, to curtail the rights of the people. On the other hand, it was contended by the Earl of Liverpool, that if their lordships did not pass this bill, they had better at once declare that, in future, every description of sedition and blasphemy should be invested with full toleration. In most instances, persons, charged with the higher crimes, were brought to immediate trial; whilst, in offences of minor note, a delay, sometimes extending to a twelvemonth, might be claimed. Thus in cases of libel, his lordship observed, the offence might be repeated day after day, and hour after hour, before the party could be brought to trial. The measure, he agreed, was an innovation; the House was bound to require evidence of strong necessity for that innovation; a necessity which existed, as he contended, in the state of the country, and the practices which so notoriously prevailed. By Lord Holland, it was urged, that, in fairness, the measure ought to be so ordered as to legislate on both sides, by preventing the delays which occurred by prosecutions on ex-officio informations, as well as by those of indictment. Agreeably to this suggestion, the Lord Chancellor, on the

the third reading, proposed the insertion of an additional clause, the object of which was to compel the Attorney General to bring a defendant to trial within a year, or to enter a noli prosequi. The bill, thus amended, was agreed to, without further opposition, by both Houses.

The other bills, alluded to by Lord Erskine, were introduced on the same evening (November 29); by Lord Sidmouth, in the Upper, and by Lord Castlereagh, in the Lower House. They were to the following effect:—An act to render the publication of a blasphemous or seditious libel punishable, on a second conviction, at the discretion of the court, by fine, imprisonment, banishment, or transportation, and to give power, in cases of a second conviction, to seize the copies of the libel in possession of the publisher.—A stamp duty, equal to that paid by newspapers, on all publications of less than a given number of sheets, with an obligation on all publishers of such pieces to enter into recognizances for the payment of such penalties as might in future be inflicted on them. The press being thus restrained, seditious meetings were to be controlled by the following provisions:—That a requisition for the holding of any meeting, other than those regularly called by a sheriff, boroughreeve, or other magistrate, should be signed by seven householders, and that it should be illegal for any persons, not inhabitants of the place in which such meeting was held, to attend it. Also, that magistrates should be empowered, within certain limitations, to appoint the time and place of meeting. To repel danger from the mustering of an illegal force, it was proposed to prohibit military training, except under the authority of a magistrate or lieutenant of a county; and, in the disturbed districts, to give to magistrates the power of seizing arms believed to be collected for unlawful purposes, and also to apprehend and detain persons so carrying arms. The only one of these bills which passed without opposition, from a generally acknowledged sense of its expediency, under the existing circumstances of the country, was that for the prevention of secret military training. The bill for the seizure of arms, which, under certain circumstances, and in particular districts, authorized search to be made in private houses, by day or night, was strenuously resisted in both Houses; and, upon an amendment for omitting the words "or night," the House of Commons divided—Ayes 46, Noes 158. A clause of the blasphemous and seditious libel bill, by which offenders were, upon a second conviction, subjected to the punishment of transportation, passed the House of Lords, but ministers found it expedient to withdraw it in the Commons. The penalty of banishment, however, which had been previously unknown to the English law, was allowed to be enacted. In its progress, the seditious meeting bill was subjected to a modification, by which all meetings, held in any room or building, were exempted from its operation. Several limitations of the bill, for subjecting small publications to the newspaper stamp duty, were also introduced.

On the 30th of November, the evening after the restriction bills had been brought forward in both Houses, the Marquis of Lansdowne rose to move for a select committee, to inquire into the state of the nation, and more especially of those which were called disturbed districts. The principle called radicalism, his lordship said, existed in exactly the same proportion as that of distress, in the respective districts. He had a right to infer this, from the agricultural part of the country being yet untainted; and, from the spirit of radicalism having reached its height in the cotton manufacturing districts of both England and Scotland. The distress arose from the long war, which gave us the whole carrying trade of the world, which created a fixed capital that still existed, and filled the markets without the possibility of finding a vent for them. The distress was also increased by the poor laws, the paper currency, and the spirit of excessive speculation. Adverting to the expedients which had been proposed, for the alleviation of distress, by the advancement of temporary loans, to encourage labour, and to furnish labour to those who could not obtain it, he said there were two other points of a more extended nature: one was to take off duties on articles which had considerably decreased in various districts—such as tea, which had been greatly reduced in consumption, and was subject to much smuggling, from America and other parts; the other point was the establishment of favourable commercial treaties, which the Prince Regent's government had not yet succeeded in accomplishing. He alluded, in particular, to the timber trade with Norway, which, he said, had been neglected, to encourage the growth of an inferior article in Canada, which prevented Norway taking in return many of our articles of commerce. He mentioned these things with a view to their being tried, and to show to our starving population, that Parliament left nothing untried to afford them relief. The Marquis Wellesley deprecated the seditious designs and views of the reformers, and thought the discussion of the restriction bills ought to be proceeded with in preference to any inquiry. Lord Erskine contended, that the country was by no means in so alarming a state as at the time of the state trials in 1794. The existing laws were sufficient to remove the evils complained of, and to punish the guilty. He ridiculed the evidence which appeared in the papers lately laid before Parliament, with a view to prove a treasonable or seditious meeting at Manchester; and contended that there was nothing illegal in marching to a place of public meeting. Lord Grenville could not consider the designs as originating in the distress, which, he hoped, was only temporary. Such distress gave facilities to factious men, which they otherwise would not possess; but the root of the evil lay much deeper. To make alterations in the revenue of a country like this, as had been suggested by the noble marquis, was extremely difficult and dangerous. Their duty was to guard the constitution, and the peaceable part of the population, from the designs of wicked men. The promoters of the new system here, taking the French Revolution as their model, had deluged the country with blasphemous publications. He saw no grounds for inquiry on the Manchester occasion. He considered the conduct of the magistrates to have been not only free from blame, but highly meritorious. The Earl of Liverpool, in opposing the motion, quoted the following lines, with much effect:—

> "How few of all the ills that men endure, > Are those which kings or laws can cause or cure."

All the evils complained of, his lordship observed, would have the fullest consideration of Parliament, but they formed no good grounds for immediate inquiry. The motion was negatived, after considerable discussion, by 148 against 47.

Much business, of the first importance to the country, having been dispatched in the course of a very few weeks, Parliament adjourned for the Christmas recess, on the 30th of December; the Commons till the 15th, and the Lords till the 17th of February. By the deplored event, however, which speedily followed, this Parliament, the last of a long and eminently distinguished reign, was dissolved.

A. D. 1820.] The protracted existence and sufferings of his Majesty King George III. were now rapidly drawing towards a final close.

The year may be said to have opened inauspiciously. His Royal Highness the Duke of Kent, who had been seized with an inflammation on the lungs, sunk beneath the violence of the disease, and expired at Sidmouth, in Devonshire, on the 21st of January.* Eight days afterwards,

* His Royal Highness was the fourth son and fifth child of his Majesty; he was born on the 2d of November, 1767, and was consequently in the 53d year of his age. He was educated in part under the present Bishop of Salisbury; but, in the 18th year of his age, he went to Germany for the completion of his studies, and resided successively at Lunenburgh and Hanover, till October, 1787, when he removed, by his Majesty's commands, to Geneva, and there remained until he completed his 22d year. In January, 1790, his Royal Highness revisited England, but for a few days only, proceeding immediately, in a military character, to Gibraltar. With the rank of Colonel, he commanded the 7th Fusileers, which formed part of the garrison of Gibraltar, under General O'Hara, in 1790 and 1791. In that subordinate military station, his Royal Highness soon became remarkable for the diligent discharge of his own duties, and for exacting afterwards, Saturday, January 29th, the venerable and royal father of his people died. This distressing event was officially made known to the public on Sunday, by a very brief Gazette Extraordinary, containing a letter from the Duke of York to Lord Sidmouth, announcing the departure of his Majesty, accompanied by a certificate, to the same effect, from the five physicians, Halford, Baillie, Heberden, Willis and Dundas. In consequence of the royal demise, both Houses of Parliament assembled, pro forma, on Sunday, notwithstanding the adjournment; and they met every day after until Wednesday, when they adjourned to the 17th, though without transacting any other business than that of administering to the respective Members the oath of allegiance, &c. to the new Sovereign. Another Extraordinary Gazette, published on the Monday, more specifically announced the decease of his Majesty, in its initial paragraph, as follows:—

"On Saturday afternoon, at thirty-five minutes past eight o'clock, our late Most Gracious Sovereign King George the Third, whose strength had gradually declined for some weeks, expired without the least apparent suffering, at his Castle of Windsor, in the eighty-second year of his age, and the sixtieth of his reign. No sovereign ever possessed in a higher degree the veneration and affection of his subjects, and their grief for his loss is only abated by the unhappy malady, which has precluded his Majesty from directing the measures of his government during the nine latter years of his glorious reign."

The first signs of decay in the excellent constitution which had been enjoyed by his Majesty, appeared about two months before his death, when, after suffering much from a severe cold, he was attacked by a slight diarrhœa, which, however, after some days, yielded to anodyne and astringent medicines, and all apprehensions with respect to the consequences ceased. It was not till several days had elapsed from the publication of the usual monthly bulletin, that his Majesty's symptoms became a cause of peculiar anxiety and solicitude to his medical attendants. At that period, his disorder returned with greater violence, and, in despite of the utmost skill of his physicians, several of whom remained in constant attendance, continued from day to day to make visible inroads on the health and strength of the Royal Patient. Amongst the inhabitants of Windsor, who had opportunities of observing the increased vigilance that pervaded the movements about the Castle, the suspicion soon infused itself, that an unfavourable change had taken place in the health of his Majesty. The Lords in waiting were noticed to remain longer at their post, and to quit their charge for shorter periods than usual. His Majesty, in the early access of his second attack, refused animal food. The most nourishing diet, in every form that could be devised to tempt his appetite, was prepared for him, but it seemed to fail in its purpose of sustaining or recruiting exhausted nature. A few days before his death, he became reduced almost to a skeleton. The general decay to which his constitution was now subjected showed itself in the usual symptoms. It was evident that his blood was becoming torpid and chilly; for though artificial means were used to raise the temperature of his apartments, yet he continued to manifest increasing suffering from cold. Among other distressing proofs of his debility, and approaching dissolution, he lost his remaining teeth: he also lost his appetite, which had previously been so hearty, that it had been usual to medicate his food in order to procure digestion, and prevent any injury from the tendency to excessive indulgence. It was not, however, till within two days of his decease, that he kept his bed entirely, though for several days past he had not risen at his accustomed early hour. On the night of Friday, the symptoms became so alarming that Sir Henry Halford went express to London very early on Saturday morning, and had an immediate audience of the Duke of York. The consequence was, that his Royal Highness's carriage was immediately ordered, and without a moment's delay he set forward with post horses for Windsor Castle. His Royal Highness appeared agitated as he exacting a similar punctuality from every man and officer under him. His attention to the appearance and discipline of his regiment was altogether exemplary and unremitting; but, as he could not inspire all the military world with an equal sense of the solid value of those dry, homely, and uninteresting duties which employ so large a portion of military life, the Colonel of the 7th Fusileers was for some time an unpopular commander. He frequently issued orders on points which were of inferior moment, and enforced them rigorously, because he had issued them. By this system, by a conscientious fulfilment of his own duties, a firm requisition of the like conduct from others, and an anxious interposition on behalf of every individual who had wrongs to be redressed or claims to be recommended, he at length carried the discipline of his regiment to the highest pitch, and established for himself the most respectable military reputation. From Gibraltar his Royal Highness was removed to Canada in 1791. From this station he proceeded, in December, 1793, through the United States to the West Indies, to join the army under the late Lord Grey, and was present at the reduction of St. Lucia, on the 4th of April following. On the expedition the impetuous bravery of his Royal Highness was manifested at St. Lucia, with too little consideration for his own safety, and too much disregard to the enemy's position. The troops were repulsed; but the Duke of Kent's high personal courage obtained him the applauses of his soldiers, and a flattering rebuke from the Commander-in-Chief. At the close of the campaign of 1794, the Duke of Kent, pursuant to his Majesty's commands, returned to British North America, and served at Halifax as Major General till 1796, and as Lieutenant General till 1798, when, in consequence of a severe fall from his horse, he was obliged to return to England. In April, 1799, his Royal Highness was created a Peer by the titles of Duke of Kent and Strathern, and Earl of Dublin, and obtained a Parliamentary establishment adequate to the support of his new dignities. The following month he was promoted to the rank of General in the army, and appointed Commander-in-Chief in North America, to which he proceeded in July; but ill health again obliged him to return, and he arrived in England in the Autumn of 1800. In March, 1802, his Royal Highness was appointed Governor-in-Chief of the important fortress of Gibraltar, which office he held till the time of his decease. In May, 1802, he went to preside there in person, and exerted himself very laudably to suppress the licentiousness and dissipation of the wine-houses. The honourable attempt was made, but with doubtful success. The wine licences were withdrawn; and, for a time, the peaceable inhabitants of Gibraltar could carry on their business, and walk the streets, and repose within their dwellings, at less risk of insult, or outrage, than before; drunkenness disappeared among the regiments; cleanliness and discipline were restored, while military punishments were reduced in frequency, the hospitals emptied of their numerous inmates, and the sexton disappointed of his daily work. The liquor merchants, however, were forced to discontinue their enormous profit; and they instigated the unreflecting soldiery to vengeance for the loss of those indulgences which devoured their pay and destroyed their health. Insubordination broke out on all sides, the Governor was not supported by the local authorities, and, after receiving the grateful and unanimous acknowledgments of the civil population of Gibraltar, he returned from a post in which his efforts for public good were more zealous than fortunate. His Royal Highness thought it advisable to return to England in May, 1803, where he continued to reside till 1816, when economical views led him to the Continent. Here he continued, residing principally at Brussels, till May, 1818, on the 29th of which month he was married, at Cobourg, according to the Lutheran rites, to her Serene Highness Victoria Maria Louisa, youngest daughter to the late reigning Duke of Saxe Cobourg; widow of his late Serene Highness the Prince of Leiningen; and sister of his Royal Highness the Prince of Saxe Cobourg, the chosen husband of our much lamented Princess Charlotte. The Royal Pair, shortly after the solemnity, arrived in England, and were remarried, according to the rites of the English Church, at Kew Palace, on the 11th of July, 1818. Persevering in the economical plan which he had laid before his marriage, the Duke, a few weeks after his second ceremony, returned with his Royal Bride to Amorbach, the residence of the Duke of Leiningen, which the Duchess, who was left by the will of her late husband guardian of her son, a minor, and Regent of the principality during his minority, had occupied as her residence. It was during their Royal Highness's retirement at this spot, that the Duchess proved to be pregnant; and as her Royal Highness fully concurred in the sentiments entertained by her illustrious consort, as an Englishman, that her child ought to draw its first breath on English ground, they both revisited this country, where the Duchess gave birth to a daughter, named Alexandrina Victoria, who was born at Kensington Palace, on the 24th of May, 1819. His Royal Highness, a few weeks previous to his death, took his Duchess and their lovely offspring into Devonshire, to give them the benefit of its purer air and milder climate; but unhappily fell himself a victim to a sudden attack of a pulmonary inflammation, produced by accidental cold. At the time of his death, besides the offices and dignities which have been already enumerated, his Royal Highness was invested with those of a Knight of the Garter, Thistle, and St. Patrick, a Knight Grand Cross of the Bath, Keeper and Paler of Hampton Court Park, Colonel of the Royal Scots' Regiment of Foot, and from the year 1805, a Field Marshal in the army. His Royal Highness was tall in stature, of a manly and noble presence. His manners were affable, condescending, dignified and engaging; his conversation animated; his information varied and copious; his memory exact and retentive; his intellectual power quick, strong, and masculine; he resembled the King, in many of his tastes and propensities; he was an early riser, a close economist of his time; temperate in eating; and heedless of slight indisposition, from confidence in the general strength of his constitution; a kind master, a punctual and courteous correspondent, a steady friend, and an affectionate brother. The remains of his Royal Highness were privately interred in the royal chapel of St. George, at Windsor, on the evening of the 12th of February.

got into the coach; and there was an air of mystery and hurry in the whole affair, which gave but too much reason to anticipate the distressing nature of Sir Henry Halford's communication. At ten o'clock on Saturday morning, the medical attendants, and the Lords in waiting, felt assured that the last hour of the venerable sufferer was approaching, and that the day must terminate his mortal career. As the evening advanced, his Majesty became weaker and weaker, but apparently without the slightest pain, till nature became quite exhausted; and, as already stated, he breathed his last, without suffering even a struggle. The decay, though rapid, was unaccompanied with any violent or sudden changes, so that none of that physical excitement had occurred which sometimes, in cases of mental derangement, restores to sufferers in their last moments a transient use of their understanding, and imbitters the parting hour with a consciousness of their late dreadful situation. Our venerable Sovereign was spared this last pang: there was no returning visit of his reason, which could only have served to torture him with a sense of what he had lost, as well as what he was about to lose. It is true that from this insensibility, he could not have the melancholy satisfaction of witnessing, by his death bed, the affectionate duty of the Duke of York; but then he was saved from the anguish of missing the aged partner of his throne, his beloved grandchild, and that estimable prince whose manly virtues so nearly resembled his own. At the moment of his dissolution, there were present, besides the usual attendants, his Royal Highness the Duke of York, Lord Henley, Lord Winchilsea, all the physicians, and General Taylor. In the palace were the Duchess of Gloucester, the Princesses Augusta, Sophia, &c. Immediately after the decease, the Duke of York retired, and dispatched General Cartwright with the mournful intelligence to the Prince Regent. His Royal Highness did not himself leave the Castle till Sunday morning.

Over the last nine years of his Majesty's life, an awful veil had been drawn. In the periods of the deepest national solicitude, his mind had felt no interest; in the hour of the most acute domestic feeling, his eye had been tearless; almost the last time that this venerable sovereign appeared in public, was on the day when his people, with one accord, devoted themselves to rejoicing in honour of his completion of a period of his reign far beyond the common term of dominion. He was blind; but, as he rode through the assembled thousands of his subjects, his countenance was dilated by the goodness and rapture of his heart; he was indeed the object of every one's veneration and love. In a few weeks, one of the most afflicting domestic calamities that he had ever experienced—the death of his beloved daughter, the Princess Amelia—bowed him to the dust. The anguish of the father was too great for a wounded spirit to bear—in his mental suffering his reason forsook him—and it never returned. The strength of the King's recollection remained unimpaired almost to the last, but the alteration of his reason was never, in any considerable degree, diminished.

It was on Wednesday, the 16th of February, that a long, a last farewell was taken of one of the best and most amiable princes that ever swayed the sceptre of Britain. On the evening of that day, his honoured remains were consigned to their native dust.* A nation's tears bedewed his grave: the people felt that his mortal part part was no longer with them; but they felt also that the memory of his many virtues would be enshrined for ever in their hearts. The solemnity and reverence with which the day was observed in the metropolis, and even in the remotest parts of the kingdom, has never been equalled by any public expression of sorrow within the memory of living man. More acutely painful grief was probably felt upon the untimely death of the Princess Charlotte; but the awful and sacred homage which was offered from every heart, on the day of the King's interment, seemed intimately associated with a sense of the majesty and sanctity of character by which George III. was distinguished amongst princes.

Soon after ten o'clock on the Tuesday morning, the preparations were completed for the mournful ceremonial of his Majesty's remains lying in state; and the gates of Windsor Castle were then thrown open for admission of the public, many hundreds of whom had been anxiously waiting there for some hours. A strong party of the Bow Street Police were in attendance, to prevent the intrusion of improper persons, and they were assisted by the labourers and inferior domestics of the Castle, in long black coats and state caps of the same colour. The public were, in the first place, admitted by the grand entrance to the Upper Ward, or Square of the Black Horse. The entrance was parted by a strong railing, diverging within the Ward to the right and left, so that the stream of company, which incessantly poured in, was by this means directed at once to the North-eastern Tower of the quadrangle, commonly called Egerton's Tower. At the door, four Marshals' men were stationed, with their silver-tipped staves, and wearing, in addition to their state uniforms, ample scarfs of black silk, with crape hatbands, sword knots, &c. Ascending the winding stairs of the tower, the visitor, after passing through an ante-chamber, filled with Marshals' men and Yeomen of the Guard, entered at once into St. George's Hall, where the departed Sovereign had been accustomed to hold the Chapter of the Knights of the Garter. The throne and its canopy were covered with black cloth, and at the foot of the steps was a slight railing, also covered with black. Over the Hall, diagonally to the door of the Guard Chamber, matting was laid down, with a black cord on each side, to confine the company to the space it occupied; and, without this cord, were stationed privates of the Life Guards, with their arms reversed. This apartment had a very impressive effect. The spectator, surrounded by the heroes of Waterloo in mournful and motionless attitudes, walls in pictured pomp arrayed, and a whole people in the weeds of mourning, found himself in that far famed Hall, where the Monarch, whose mouldering remains he was approaching,

"Once shone the leader of the garter'd line."

This led at once to the King's Guard-Chamber and state apartments, where the Knights of the Garter, in the absence of the Sovereign, dine at an installation. The lofty walls of this apartment are entirely covered with the armour of past ages; bills and partizans, coats of mail, helmets, cuirasses, and glaives; bucklers and shields; matchlocks, broad swords, pistols, daggers, muskets, and the armour of Edward the Black Prince. The visitors were, in this chamber also, separated from the great body of the apartment by a cord covered with black; and, in the open space, Yeomen of the Guard were assembled, in groupes, who, not being immediately upon duty, waited here to relieve their comrades. Their costume was the same, in form, as their ordinary one; but it was entirely of black cloth, with crape round the cap, and the arms of England embroidered in gold, silver, and colours. Their partizans had also a covering of black cloth. From this the spectator passed through an ante-chamber; the floor, ceiling, and walls, entirely covered with sable drapery, and lighted at intervals by silver sconces, each bearing two small wax lights; just sufficient to show a long line of Yeomen of the Guard, leaning on their crape-clothed partizans as motionless as statues. He then entered the Presence Chamber, in which reposed "all that could die" of our beloved monarch. The whole of this noble apartment was entirely clothed with fine purple cloth, and illuminated by a profusion of silver sconces. On a raised platform, at the opposite extremity, appeared the coffin * supported upon tressels, and covered with a pall of rich purple velvet, lined with white satin, and ornamented at each side by three escutcheons, and on the top were deposited the Kingly Crown of England, and the electoral one of Hanover, on two purple velvet cushions, superbly fringed and tasseled with gold. On each side of the coffin were three stupendous wax lights, in massive silver candlesticks, and over it a radiated canopy of purple cloth; the cornice was also adorned with escutcheons. At the head of the coffin were seated the Earl of Delawarr and Lord Graves, the Lords in waiting; and Colonel Whatley, Colonel King, Sir George Campbell, and Sir Cavendish Bradshaw, the Grooms in waiting. At the feet stood the Pursuivants, in official costume, but uncovered, and about the apartment were a number of the Band of Gentlemen Pensioners, in their state dresses, with crape scarfs, &c. The scene was solemn and impressive beyond all expression. Thence the company passed through the King's drawing-room and its ante-chambers, and descended by the staircase in the western tower, where King John resided during the time of his contest with his barons; and thence out through the quadrangle, by the grand southern entrance. At four o'clock, the hour announced for closing the public ceremony of the day, the gates were shut; but the Lords in waiting, the Earl of Delawarr and Lord Graves, continued to watch by the Royal corpse throughout the night,

"The procession from the entrance to the choir, within the chapel, will be flanked by the Grenadiers of the Foot Guards, every fourth man bearing a flambeau."

* The exterior coffin was composed of Spanish mahogany, and covered with rich Genoa velvet of royal blue, a few shades deeper than garter blue. The top or gutter was divided into three compartments by double rows of silver gilt studs. In the compartment of the head, over a rich star of the order of the Garter, was placed the Royal Arms of England, beautifully executed in dead gold. In the centre compartment was the plate, with the inscription, of silver richly gilt, and exquisitely burnished. In the lower compartments at the feet, was the British lion, rampant regardant, supporting a shield with the letters G. R. surrounded with the Garter and motto of the same order, also in dead gold. All the angles of the whole of these compartments were filled up with highly burnished silver gilt plates, engraved G. R. III. and surmounted by the Royal Crown. The sides and ends of this superb coffin were also divided with silver gilt studs, in the same manner as the cover, so as to leave three spaces in each side, and one at each end for the handles. The handles were of silver, richly gilt, of a massive modern pattern, and the most exquisitive workmanship; and each handle was surrounded by a frame work in the same taste, chiefly in dead gold, but delicately relieved by burnishing.

night, relieving each other every two hours, and attended by the pages of the bedchamber. In the course of the afternoon, two battalions of Foot Guards, eight troops of the Royal Horse Guards Blue, and a brigade of artillery, with twelve field pieces, for the purpose of firing minute guns on the day of the funeral, arrived in the town. At break of day on Wednesday, the solemn toll of the great bell in the belfry of the Castle, was heard in the solemn silence of the grey and chilly morning, and the royal standard was seen through the hazy atmosphere, hanging mournfully half-staff down, on the round tower of the Keep. At sun-rise the thunder of cannon was heard in the Park. From that period till sun-set, the artillery, without intermission, continued firing five-minute guns throughout the day; and from sun-set, they fired minute guns till the conclusion of the funeral ceremony. A little before ten o'clock, the wax lights in the silver sconces having been replenished, and the Lords and Grooms in waiting, the pages of the bedchamber, the Heralds, the Pursuivants, the Gentlemen pensioners, and the other state attendants, having taken their station around the royal coffin, his Royal Highness the Duke of York proceeded up the grand staircase and through the King's drawing-room. His Royal Highness appeared agitated and distressed, and having stood for a moment at the door of the Presence Chamber, in mute contemplation of the coffin, and the lurid splendours by which it was surrounded, he retired, leaning on the arm of Colonel Stephenson. The grand entrance to the upper court of the castle was then thrown open to the impatient public, who rushed forward in all directions; and, in despite of the utmost exertions of the police and military, the pressure continued more or less throughout the morning. At four o'clock the ceremony of the royal remains lying in state was at an end, and the gates were closed against thousands of persons, who, up to that moment, had been pressing forward for admission. Throughout the whole of the preceding night, preparations had been busily making in St. George's Chapel. Three additional chandeliers were suspended from the roof along the centre of the choir, and a double sconce affixed to each of the stalls. Superb communion services of plate, from the different chapels royal, were arranged upon the communion table, the steps of which were covered with fine purple cloth. A raised platform covered with black cloth was erected down the south aisle, and up the nave of the choir, with a railing on each side to prevent interruption to the procession from the spectators. In the north aisle seats were erected, tier above tier, for the accommodation of those persons who might be able to obtain tickets from the Lord High Steward; and the organ loft, which is not capable of affording accommodation to more than ninety persons, was fitted up for the nobility. Before the communion table, and over the opening of the subterraneous passages leading to the mausoleum of the Royal Family, a superb canopy of royal blue velvet was placed, supported by four slight pillars, wreathed with velvet and gold. The canopy was in the shape of a parallelogram, with the roof of the sweeping Chinese contour, and surrounded with a gothic fretwork cornice in dead gold. From this cornice descended a festooned drapery of the royal blue velvet, richly fringed and tasselled, of the same colour, and each festoon was further adorned with a royal escutcheon. To the right and left of the altar, diagonally, seats were placed in tiers for the Foreign Ambassadors, and the whole floor of the choir was covered with black cloth. As the evening advanced, the Eton scholars, assembled under their respective masters, to the number of more than five hundred, clothed in deep mourning, walked two and two to the gate of the hundred steps, where, by the previous order of his Majesty, they were admitted through the cloisters to the interior of the Royal Chapel, and took up their station in the north aisle.

After the conclusion of the public ceremony of lying in state, and when the visitors were all excluded from the Castle, the Lords in waiting and the other state attendants still remained with the royal corpse till seven o'clock, when his Royal Highness the Duke of York, as Chief Mourner, took his seat at the head of the coffin, under the canopy, in lieu of the Lords in waiting, and he continued sitting there during the lapse of two hours. In the interim, the persons who were to take part in the procession were assembled in St. George's Hall, and there marshalled by Sir George Nayler, the Windsor Herald. At nine o'clock the Duke of York left the presence chamber, and the Yeomen of the Guard, under the superintendence of the Exon, Captain Cipriani, removed the coffin of their royal master down the grand staircase to the vestibule, where it was placed upon the car; and, in a few minutes afterwards, the procession set forward in the order described in a preceding note, along the raised and covered platform, erected from the grand entrance of the state apartments, athwart the Lower Court of the Castle to the great porch of the royal chapel. The covered way was flanked on each side by a double rank of the Foot Guards, with their arms reversed, and a single rank of mounted Life Guards, every fourth man having a lighted flambeau. As the procession issued from the palace, the silver trumpets of the household commenced the performance of the "Dead march in Saul," in which they were joined by the bands of the several regiments on duty as they advanced. The progress of the procession was extremely slow; the discharge of the minute guns adding greatly to the effect of the grand and impressive scene. The procession having reached the porch of the chapel, the Knight Marshal's men, with trumpets and drums, filed off without the doors. At the entrance, the royal corpse was received by the Very Reverend the Dean, attended by the choirs, who fell in immediately before Blanc Coursier, King at Arms, bearing the Crown of Hanover. The whole then proceeded down the south aisle, and up the nave to the choir. As they advanced, the organ performed Dr. Croft's funeral service, "I am the resurrection and the life, saith the Lord." This occupied the time till the Royal Dukes, their supporters, and the other members of the procession, had reached their respective seats. The Chief Mourner sat on a chair at the head of the corpse; and the other Princes of the Blood Royal were seated near him. The Lord Chamberlain of his Majesty's household (the Marquis of Hertford) took his seat at the feet of the corpse, and the supporters of the Pall and Canopy arranged themselves on each side. The part of the service before the interment, was then read by the Dean; the choir chaunting the Psalms. Kent's Anthem, "Hear my prayer O Lord," was then performed, followed by "I heard a voice from heaven." The service then proceeded to the collect, immediately preceding which, the celebrated anthem, composed by Handel for the funeral of Queen Caroline, was performed with the most exquisite pathos by the whole choir. The royal corpse was lowered into the grave exactly at ten minutes after ten; and as the consecrated earth was sprinkled upon its cover, the Guards, who during the ceremony had stood with their arms reversed, instantly recovered and grounded them on the pavement of the north and south aisle. The iron-shod buts of the heavy muskets, as they fell on the pavement in rapid succession, sounded like a peal of thunder, as the echoes it occasioned died away through the long vaulted roof of the building. It had a chilling, and almost superhuman effect. At this awful moment, the venerable Sir Isaac Heard, Garter King at Arms, came forward in his superb embroidered mantle, and pronounced the style and titles of his late Majesty. At the conclusion of the mournful ceremony, the Royal Dukes slowly quitted the choir at the side door, followed by a long train of the great officers of state, the nobility, &c. and proceeded to the chapter house, whence they immediately went to their apartments in the Castle, and the nobility repaired to their carriages; but it was long after midnight before the different courts of the Castle were entirely cleared.

RETROSPECTIVE AND CONCLUDING REMARKS.

HAVING consigned, in peaceful repose, to "the house appointed for all living," the mouldering remains of the departed monarch, we proceed to close this eventful period of British history, with a few remarks, illustrative of the march of Science and the Arts, of Agriculture and Commerce, of Population and Finance, under the auspices of his Majesty George III. The universal voice of the people has, at all times, paid a tribute of respect to the personal virtues of that sovereign; and, when it is considered that the personal character of a King extends to the character of his Court, and that the influence of example, set by the great, is powerful and extensive, it will be seen that, for much of our private, as well as of our public virtue, the nation is indebted to his late Majesty.—George III. on coming to the Crown, laid his commands upon the Duke of York to discontinue card-playing on a Sunday, and openly to acknowledge his obedience to the royal will in this respect. The injunction was understood, and obeyed in the politest circles. The King also did his utmost to suppress those pernicious assemblies, masquerades—a species of amusement which, should it ever be nationalized in England, would prove a source of infinite misery and ruin to domestic affection. The King, however, was neither an anchorite nor a recluse: he was fond of the theatre; and to his taste and good judgment, the amateurs of the histrionic art are indebted for most of those improvements which constitute the boast of modern days. The costume of the stage underwent a thorough reform; the licentiousness of dramatic writers was effectually curbed; and many of the scenes, which Dryden and Congreve did not blush to avow, would not, for a moment, be tolerated by an audience of the present time.

The Graphic Arts may be said to have received a character and establishment in the reign of his late Majesty; who, first of all, under the date of January, 1765, gave a charter of incorporation to a society of artists, whose exhibitions had been commenced five years before. The royal bounty presented them with an annual donation of 100*l*. The Royal Academy was instituted some years afterwards. Previously to that period, there was no such thing as an English School of Art: now, the connoisseur may distinguish, in our public exhibitions, portraits which compete with the best works of Vandyke, and historical pieces that are not unworthy of the noblest times of Italy.

The Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Sciences, and Commerce, in the Adelphi, originated in the year 1753, before his Majesty came to the crown. That society had proposed premiums, and had conferred bounties on pictures of merit; had brought into notice many rising artists, in various branches; and had, moreover, taken steps towards encouraging the art of engraving. The establishment of engraving, however, in its more elevated classes, as a national art, and as an important branch of commerce, must be placed in the reign of George III.; for, not till then, had the landscapes of Wilson, immortalized by the graver of Woollet, or the prints from British history after West, obtained circulation throughout the world. Wilson, and West, and Woollet, were British artists, as were Strange and Hall, M'Ardell and Earlom. Engraving also received great encouragement, by the patronage which was bestowed by the King, and by the public, on Bartolozzi, an Italian. The tide of popular favour seemed indeed to be divided between that meritorious artist, an engraver, and his countryman and fellow student, Cipriani, a painter.

George III. was a competent judge of architecture; he amused his leisure hours with the composition of architectural designs; and the embellishments of various kinds which were executed under his patronage, at Windsor, will long be regarded as monuments of his munificence and taste.

Every branch of our domestic and commercial arts has rapidly approached towards the summit of excellence. Who can endure the gross shapes, and still grosser embossings, of the China wares which passed for respectable in the early part of the last century, when compared with the elegant patterns that now adorn our tables? The furniture and fitting up of our houses partake of the same refinement. Formerly, the originals of our cabinet works, even to the tables and chairs, were French; our mantle pieces, our mirrors, and our pictures, were Italian. The tide has turned: our manufactures of all sorts, no less for their taste in imagination than for their skill in execution, are now admired all over the continent.

Maritime discovery made astonishing progress in the reign of George III. When Jefferies was geographer to the King, that artist, however high in reputation for talent and knowledge, was obliged, by the necessity of the case, to inscribe "parts unknown" over a great portion of the earth's superficies: the discoveries of the immortal Cook, Carteret, King, Vancouver, and others, have reduced the terræ incognitæ within narrow limits, which become every day more and more contracted.* By those

* The great northern expeditions respectively under the command of Captain Ross and Lieutenant Parry, may be regarded as the last maritime glories of the reign of George III. The former of these, although very important and interesting, from the numerous nautical observations it made in Baffin's Bay, still did not satisfy the expectations of men of science and the public, in regard to the north-west passage. The lords of the Admiralty were, on the whole, somewhat dissatisfied with Captain Ross's investigation of Sir James Lancaster's Sound, and were of opinion, that if a passage existed in Baffin's Bay, it must be somewhere in that quarter. In order to determine this important geographical problem, an expedition was fitted out in the spring of 1819, consisting of two strong vessels, the Hecla and Griper, which were placed under the command of Lieutenant Parry. This gentleman, whose talents and feelings were worthy of the best and most glorious days of nautical enterprise and discovery, was accompanied by a chosen band of intrepid and experienced officers, and the vessels were manned by crews full of zeal and enthusiasm, and in the highest and most perfect state of discipline. Government provided every comfort and convenience for the crews embarked in this perilous undertaking; and it was universally acknowledged that no discovery ships ever left the shores of England in a higher state of equipment.

They left England on the 11th of May, 1819, and reached Cape Farewell, the most southern part of West Greenland, on the 14th of the succeeding June. On the 20th of June, the ships were in lat. 64, north: on the 26th of June, they were beset in the ice; and, after having endeavoured, but in vain, to urge their way, during a painful detention of four days, were, at last, glad to get back again. Having reached lat. 74, north, they determined to force a passage through the barrier of ice, which they found to be eighty miles broad. Having succeeded in this, they reached Possession Bay on the 31st of July; and, on the 1st of August, entered, in safety, Sir James Lancaster's Sound, where they found the same open sea which had been described in the accounts of the former expedition. They advanced to long. 89, west, meeting with but little obstruction from the ice, and in long. 90, west, discovered two considerable islands, named Prince Leopold's Isles. But, at this point, their progress westward was interrupted by a strong barrier of ice, extending quite across from these islands to the north coast of what Captain Parry named Barrow's Straits. Being thus arrested by the ice, and forced to alter their course, they now entered a great inlet, of 14 or 15 leagues in breadth, which they found extending to the southward. They sailed along its eastern coast, its middle part and western coast being blocked up with ice, as far as lat. 71, north, when their further progress southward also was found to be impossible, by reason of the ice. In proceeding down this inlet, the magnetic attraction increased so powerfully, that the existence of the magnetic pole may be conjectured to be somewhere in that neighbourhood, probably in the lat. 70, north, and long. 100, west.

On their return to Barrow's Straits, it was found that the barrier of ice, extending across from Prince Leopold's Isles to the north coast, had broken up, so that the ships were now enabled to pursue their course westwards. Having reached long. 92, they found the land on the north side of the Strait, which had been continuous, from the entrance those geographical discoveries, our knowledge of natural history, of the vegetable as well as of the animal world, has been greatly augmented. Nor was the royal bounty confined to discoveries on the face of the globe; the penetrating telescope of Dr. Herschell owes its powers and its completion to the munificence of the King: and whatever we know of the Georgium Sidus, of the lesser satellites of Saturn, of the celestial nebulæ, and of other astronomical phenomena, must be attributed to the zeal for the advancement of science, that honoured, while it gratified, the monarch by whom it was entertained.

Agriculture, the basis of national prosperity, has experienced much royal attention, and many consequent benefits, since the year 1760. Numerous statutes have been passed for converting barren wastes into arable land—for draining marshes—for forming roads, constructing bridges, canals, ports, with other improvements; all contributing to facilitate the intercourse of the kingdom, and consequently favouring the transit of agricultural productions. His Majesty made a point of obtaining more than a theoretical acquaintance with a subject of such vital importance. He established an experimental farm; he procured from Spain the most valuable specimens of the superior races of Merino sheep; and he allowed the breed to be disposed of to noblemen and gentlemen who were inclined to engage in the speculation. The King is understood to have furnished several letters to Young's "Annals of Agriculture," under the signature of John Robinson.

Knowledge and general literature, as the means of mental gratification and amusement, his Majesty was ever ready to patronise. Since the commencement of his reign, the number of schools for elementary instruction has been greatly increased; the multitudes of children who receive gratuitous instruction are truly wonderful; and the King's wish, "that every poor child in his dominions might be able to read his Bible, and might have a Bible to read," seems to be in a fair way of being realized.

The population of the British Empire has experienced a rapid and wonderful increase. In the island of Britain alone, in the year 1760, it was not more than 8,000,000: in 1811, it was 12,353,000. To which must be added the population of Ireland, taken at above 4,000,000, with the absentees from Britain, in our various colonies and dependencies, making a total of 18,000,000; and forming, with the natives of those distant dependencies, a grand total of more than 60,000,000 of souls, who at this moment avow allegiance to the British Crown. The wonders of our population are strikingly shown by the following statement of the military force of Britain, as it stood in the year 1812;—

of Sir James Lancaster's Sound, now discontinuous, owing to a great inlet. Land, however, was still seen to the westward; so the expedition continued its course in that direction. In doing so, the ships passed a number of great islands, all of them apparently surrounded with ice; from which circumstance, partial detentions were unavoidable, and their course ran in a sort of zigzag style, from lat. 73, north, to lat. 75, north.

On the 4th of September they were in long. 110 deg. W., and here they discovered an island which appeared to be larger than any they had hitherto examined, and which was named Melville Island, in honour of the distinguished statesman, then at the head of the Admiralty. This island extends from long. 106, W. to 114, W. On the 8th of September the ships reached 110, W. and were enclosed several days in the ice. Winter was now fast approaching; the ice was rapidly increasing, and violent north-westerly gales kept it in a constant and dangerous state of agitation.

These circumstances, of course, rendered the navigation very difficult, and began to endanger the safety of the ships. Our gallant countrymen, however, continued to contend with all these difficulties till the 22d of September, when it, became evident, that further navigation was at an end for the season; and therefore prudence dictated their retreat to a secure haven for the polar winter. For this purpose they returned eastward, and found a harbour in Melville Island; but the ice had already formed from eight to ten inches thick, and therefore the crews were forced to cut a passage for three miles through the ice. The 26th of September, in short, had arrived before they were fixed in their winter quarters, in five fathoms water, and within about 200 yards from the shore. The latitude of this harbour named Winter Harbour, is 74, N. and long. 111, W. Hitherto they had never lost sight of a continuous barrier of ice to the southward, that is, from west long. 90, to the extreme of Melville Island. Every thing was soon made snug for the formidable winter of these regions. The officers and crews formed various plans for passing the dreary days, or rather nights, of the polar regions. Plays were performed by the officers for their own amusement and that of the crews; and a melo-drama was written, having for its object the probable success of the expedition, and their ultimate return to their friends through Behring's Straits, after having planted the British flag in countries which eluded the bold and fearless darings of a Davis and a Baffin.

The sun disappeared entirely on the 11th of November. The thermometer was below Zero of Fahrenheit's scale when the expedition entered Winter Harbour. In the month of November the spirit of wine thermometer was 55 deg. below Zero, and in February, the coldest month of these regions, the spirit of wine pointed to the tremendous cold of 54 and 55 degrees below Zero. During these intense colds, our adventurous countrymen felt but little inconvenience so long as they remained under the housing of their ships. A slight covering for the ears, and shawl around the neck, were considered as sufficient protection against the most intense degree of cold; but, when the atmosphere was agitated by gales of wind, then the cold became truly dreadful and insupportable, and every one was forced to seek shelter below. Nevertheless, scarcely any accident occured from exposure to cold; while the constant and regular exercise, which formed a necessary part of the duty of the crews, kept every one lively and active, and free from disease. One death only took place during the expedition, and that was in the case of an individual who had contracted the disease of which he died before he left England.

When the sun had its greatest southern declination, a twilight was perceptible at noon in the southern horizon, affording sufficient light to read a book with difficulty. The day was like the fine clear evening of winter in our climate. The stars shone with great brilliancy, and when the moon appeared in the firmament she shone with a beauty and splendour unknown in the more southern and temperate regions of the globe. The northern lights appeared frequently, generally of a yellow colour, sometimes green, but rarely red, and most commonly towards the south-west. It is remarked, that this brilliancy was seldom so great as in our country; no noise was ever heard to proceed from them, and the magnetic needle did not appear to be affected by their presence. The sun re-appeared on the 3d of February, after an absence of 83 days, and those only who had suffered the privation of "its glorious light" can feel and tell the rapture with which the crews hailed the first glimpse from the mast-head. They had calculated the exact period of its return, and were anxiously looking for it from the main-top.

In April some partial symptoms of thaw appeared. By the end of May, pools and streams of water made their appearance, and shortly after a regular thaw commenced. Nearly about this time, Captain Parry, with a party of his officers and men, crossed Melville Island, and reached the sea on the opposite side, in lat 75, N., where they discovered another island. They were fourteen days absent, and made many curious observations on the forms of the hills and mountains of this island, collected withal, very extensively, specimens of all its vegetable, animal, and mineral productions. The remains of an enormous whale were found far inland, and a few huts, intimating the presence of man, were discovered by some of the party. Vegetation had now become active, and sorrel was found in such quantities as to remove all those symptoms of scurvy which had begun to make their appearance among the crew. The ice in Winter Harbour was also beginning to dissolve rapidly, and by the end of July it had entirely disappeared. Yet the ships were still quite blocked up by the exterior ice. It was not till the 30th that the outside ice began to crack; on the 31st of July it moved off very gently, and released the crews from their winter prison, where they had been shut up 310 days.

On the 6th of August they reached the western extremity of Melville Island, situated in long. 114, W., where the ice was found to be very thick and impermeable. From this island new land was observed to the south-west, estimated to be 20 leagues distant; so that they may be said to have seen land as far west as long. 118. Many attempts were made to reach this interesting terra incognita, but in vain; and the commander and his admirable crew were, with feelings of the deepest regret, forced to return, owing to the vast barriers of ice.

Having failed in this attempt to reach the south-western land, and the winter again approaching, the vessels now sailed directly eastwards, through the polar sea and Barrow's Straits, into Sir James Lancaster's Sound, thence into Baffin's Bay, and by the usual track homewards.

In their progress among the islands, the officers shot a few rein-deer, ptarmigan, partridge, and hares; and the howls of the wolf were heard frequently in Melville Island. Several musk oxen were killed; and the crews considered it, after being properly macerated, to get rid of the musky flavour, as preferable eating to that of the rein-deer. One of the sailors, who had ventured beyond his companions in search of rein-deer, returned to the ship with all his fingers frost-bitten, from carrying his musket too long. When the fingers were plunged into cold water ice was formed on its surface, and this continued to be the case for half an hour afterwards, as often as the fingers were plunged into it. The sailor lost five of his fingers.

From Lancaster Sound to Melville Island the compass was found to be totally useless, a circumstance which left to the commanders no other guides than the heavenly bodies and the trend of the land, thus at once presenting the striking spectacle of modern navigators tracking the ocean without the compass, as was done by the mariners of old. We cannot, indeed, conceive a more striking scene than that of our discovery ships forcing their solitary course through unknown regions, surrounded with rugged, dreary and desolate wastes, in the most appalling dangers, and deprived of the use of the compass.

At the end of October the Hecla was forced into Leith roads by stress of weather; and, on the 4th of November, Lieutenant Parry, accompanied by Captain Sabine of the Royal Artillery, attached to the expedition, arrived at the Admiralty Office, London.

This enterprising navigator has since been most deservedly promoted to the rank of Post Captain.

That the strength of the kingdom has been increased, this statement sufficiently proves; and that we have not degenerated from the valour of our ancestors, witness Egypt, Copenhagen, and Trafalgar—witness Vimiera, Vittoria, and Waterloo, with many other names of great and glorious sound.

The comparison between the Royal Navy at the commencement of the late reign, and as it stood towards the conclusion of hostilities, is equally to the advantage of the latter. The British Navy proved itself more than a match for the whole maritime force of Europe. It destroyed or blockaded the fleets of France, Holland, Denmark, and Spain; and when Russia for a while assumed the character of an enemy, it met the fleet of Russia, also, with alacrity and success. The average number of ships, during the war, was about equal to the following statement:—

At sea, ships of the line	99
Fifties, &c. not reckoned of the line	14
Frigates of various sizes	133
Sloops and lesser vessels	144
Bombs	6
Brigs, &c.	139
Cutters	33
Schooners, &c.	66

Thus there were at sea more than 600 vessels; which those in ordinary, building, repairing, &c. raised to a grand total of more than 1,100. To man this navy required a force of nearly 160,000 seamen and marines; whereas in the war which raged when his Majesty came to the throne, 70,000, or 75,000 were thought to be the utmost that the nation could furnish. That the mercantile navy of Britain has increased in a wonderful ratio, needs no other proof than the necessity felt by our merchants, for enlarging the principal ports of the kingdom, by means of extensive docks, and other accommodations—as at Hull, Liverpool, London, and elsewhere. These were found to be absolutely indispensable, as well by the West India trade as by the East India trade: and, in fact, they were indispensable for the reception of vessels from all parts of the globe. In 1670, the amount of British shipping was 471,241 tons; and in 1812, it is stated by Mr. Colquhoun at 2,163,094 tons; to which add the shipping of Ireland, about 250,000 tons: the whole is valued by that intelligent writer at no less than twenty millions sterling. Previously to the commencement of the American war, the exports to the thirteen colonies amounted to 3,000,000*l.*: since that period, they have amounted to more than thrice that sum.

In the year 1760, the net customs' duties paid into the Exchequer amounted to only 1,969,934*l.* In 1815, perhaps the most flourishing year of our commerce, the consolidated customs, with the annual duties and war taxes, amounted to 11,659,324*l.*; the consolidated excise, with the annual duties and war taxes, amounted to 25,145,011*l.*; and the stamps, post office, assessed taxes, property tax, land tax, &c. produced 29,225,046*l.*; making a total net revenue of 65,429,981*l.*! Mr. Pitt estimated the total income of the country at 100,000,000*l.*; but, according to subsequent calculations, more accurately made, it is considered to be almost, if not quite, 150,000,000*l.*

The national debt, which originated in the days of King William, we are perfectly aware has been greatly increased. At the accession of Queen Anne, it amounted to upwards of 16,000,000*l.* During the administration of Sir Robert Walpole, it was thought, by well informed persons, that it might be increased to 100,000,000*l.*; but a hundred millions was the ne plus ultra of the debt: there it must stop; and that was the point of national bankruptcy. By the war of the American Revolution, however, to the great joy of the foreign enemies and rivals of England, and to the great alarm of foreigners, who had property and dealings with England, and to the terror of the whole kingdom, it was augmented to the sum of 257,000,000*l.*! and, notwithstanding the operation of the sinking fund, the amount of nominal capital of the public debt is now understood to exceed the sum of eleven hundred millions!!!

That a great debt, whether public or private, is a great evil, must be admitted. It is at once consolatory and cheering, however, to observe that this "dead weight," as it is termed by many, of the national debt, has not produced those destructive effects in the kingdom, nor on the principal causes and branches of its prosperity, which were confidently and almost despairingly expected. From the difficulties which have been overcome—from the triumphs which have been enjoyed—we are warranted, amidst a season of temporary gloom, in looking forward to bright and golden times; and, ever bearing in mind, that the career of improvement is unlimited, the prayer of the genuine patriot will be—"That prosperity may await us;—that the hopes, the wishes, the expectations of the nation may be realized, under the mild auspices of the Prince on the throne—under the firm and dignified, the beneficent and paternal sway of GEORGE THE FOURTH!"

* The reader is also referred to page 783.—Sir Philip Sydney accompanied the Earl of Leicesr on his expedition to the Netherlands. It was at the affair before Zutphen, in September, 1586, that Sir hilip, who had displayed uncommon bravery, received a mortal wound in the thigh, as he was mounting his thd horse, having had two slain under him before. While he was in the arms of his attendants, who had procuredor him a bottle of wine to allay his thirst, a wounded soldier was carried past him, and cast a wistful eye on theottle, on which Sir Philip ordered it to be taken to him, saying, "Poor fellow, thy necessity is greater tha mine!" This honour of the English nation died of his wound twenty-five days afterwards. His body was bught home and buried in St. Paul's Cathedral.

† Lord Robert Manners (only brother to the Duke of Rutland) who commanded H. M's.S. Resolution, in Lord Rodney's memorable action with the Count de Grasse, in the West Indies, on the 12th oApril, 1782, was mortally wounded during the engagement. He died of his wound, on his passage to Englan in the 25th year of his age. A monument was erected by government, in Westminster Abbey, to the memy of his Lordship, and that of the Captains Blair and Blayne, who also fell on this occasion.
